In the reign of Solomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other works of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Forty Years he reigned; how many more he lived, it is not written, and most therefore be found only by conjecture. The most likely way to guess at the truth in this case is, by considering the actions of David before and after Solomon's birth, whereby we may best make estimation of the years which they continued, and consequently learn the true, or most likely year of his nativity. Seven years David reigned in Hebron: in his eighth year he took Jerusalem, and named with the Philistines, who also troubled him in the year following. The bringing home of the Ark seems to have been in the tenth Year of David, and his intention to build the Temple in the Year ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leisure, living in rest. After this he had wars with the Philistines, Moshites, Aramites, and Edomites, which must needs have held him five Years, considering the Aramites of Damascus raised war against him, after which time he had beaten Haddadzer; and that in years of these wars, he had the entire victory. Neither is likely, that these services occupied any longer time, because in those days and places there were no wintering camps in use, but at convenient seasons of the Year, Kings went forth to war, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their Armies, partly upon the spoil of the enemies country, partly upon the private provision which every soldier made for himself. The 17 Year of David, in which he took Meghiboth the son of Joab into his Court, appeareth to have passed away in quiet; and the Year following to have begun the war with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to trial of a battle (for Joab after the victory, returned immediately to Jerusalem) the causes and preparations for that war, taking up all the Summer. David's personal expedition against the Aramites, wherein he brought all the tributaries of Haddadzer under his own allegiance, appears manifestly to have been the next Years work, wherein hied cut off all means of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab, and Idumea being now at his own devotion. By this reckoning it must have been the 20 Year of David's reign, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which he sent forth Jash to besiege Rebba, and finished the war of Ammon: wherein also he killed out the matter of Uriah's wife. So one half of David's reign was very prosperous: in the other half he felt great sorrow, by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heavy judgment laid upon him by God for his foul and bloody offence.

New vices manifest it is, that in the year after the death of that child which was begotten in adultery, Solomon was born, who must needs therefore have been nineteen Years old or thereabout when he began to reign at the death of his father, as being begotten in the 21 Year of his fathers reign, who reigned in all forty.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of David, as may be collected out of ensuing Actions: for two Years passed ere Abshalom slew his brother Amnon: three years ere his father pardoned him, and two Years more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seems to have been one Years work. So the rebellion it self, with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa, and the rest, may well seem to have been in the 30 Year of David's reign.

Whether the three years of famine should be reckoned apart from the last years of war with the Philistines, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needful to conjecture. Plain enough it is, that in the ten remaining Years of David there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for the three Years of famine, for four Years of war, and for numbering the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his own last infirmity, and disposing of the Kingdom. Yet indeed it seems that the war with the Philistines was but one years work, and ended in three or four fights, of which the two or three former were at Gath or Nob near unto Gazer, and the last at Gath. This war the Philistines undertook, as it seemeth, upon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by David's old age: for he fainted now in the battle, and was afterwards hindered by his men from exposing himself unto danger any more. So David had six or seven years of rest, in which time it is likely that many of his great men of War dyed (being of his own age) whereby the stirring spirit of Adonijah found little succour in the broken pay of Jash the son of Zeriah.

At this time it might both truly be said by David to Solomon, Thou art a wise man; and by Solomon to God, I am but a young child: for nineteen Years of age might well agree with either of these two speeches.

Nevertheless there are some that gather out of Solomon's profiting himself a child, that he was but eleven Years old when he began to reign. Of these Rabbi Solomon seems the first Author, whom other of great learning and judgment have herein followed: grounding themselves perhaps upon that which is said of Abshalom's rebellion, that it was after forty years, which they understood as Years of David's reign. But whereas Rehoboam the son of Solomon was 41 years old when he began to reign, it would follow hereby that his father had begotten him, being himself but a child of nine or ten years old; the difference between their ages being no greater, if Solomon (who reigned 40 years) were but eleven Years old when his reign began. To avoid this inconvenience, Jephthah allows 80 Years of reign to Solomon: a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeed have in favour of this opinion, construed the words of Jephthah, as if they included all the Years of Solomon's life. But by such reckoning he should have been 40 Years old at his Fathers death; and consequently should have been born long before his Father had won Jerusalem: which is a manifest untruth. Wherefore the 80 Years remembered in Abshalom's rebellion, may either seem to have reference to the space between David's first anointment, and the trouble which God brought upon him for his wickedness, or perhaps be read (according to Jephthah, Theodore, and the Latine translation) four Years; which passed between the return of Abshalom to Jerusalem, and his breaking out.

SECT. V.

Of Solomons Writings.

There remain of Solomon's Works, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Solomon. In the first he teacheth good life, and correcteth manners; in the second, the vanity of humane nature; in the third, he singeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Book intitled, The Wisdom of Solomon (which some give unto Solomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author thereof) Jerom and many others of the best learned make us think it was not Solomon that wrote it. Stylus libri sapientie (saith Jerom) qui Solomonis inscribitur, Græcam videtur eloquentiam. The Title of Græcam the Book of Wisdom, which is ascribed to Solomon, from favourers of the Græcian eloquence; and of the same opinion was S. Augustine, and yet he confisseth in the nineteenth Book, and twentieth Chapter of the City of God, that the Author of that Book hath a direct foretelling of the passion of Christ in these words: Circumveniamus iustum, quoniam iniustus est nobis, &c. Let us circumvent the righteous, for he is unpleasing to us, he is contrary to our doings, he cleaveth us for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to have the knowledge of God, and he calleth himself the son of the Lord, &c. and doth the course of all the following words point directly at Christ. The Books of Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, and Cantica Canticorum, Rabbi Moser, Kimchi ascribeth to Isaiah the Prophet. Suidas s. Sen. Jul. Cedrenus report, that Solomon wrote of the remedies of all diseases, and graved the same on the sides of the Porch of the Temple, which (they say) Ezechias pulled down, because the people, neglecting help from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoveries.

Of Solomon's Books of Invocations, and Enchantments to cure diseases, and expeel evil spirits, Jephthah hath written at large, though (as I conceive) rather out of his own invention, or from some uncertain report, than truly.

He also speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the root in Solomon's ring disposed divers persons of evil spirits in the presence of Yeshaphat, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly, so strange an example of humane frailty hath never been read of as this King: who having received Wisdom from God himself in honour of whom, and for his only service, he built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Israel and Judea, not by the law of Nature, but by the love of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perfwade of a few weak and wretched Idolatrous Women, forgotten, and forsake the Lord of all the world, and the giver of all goodnes, of which he was more liberal to this King, than to any that ever the world had. Of whom Syracides writeth in this manner: Solomon reigned in a peaceable time, and was glorious; for God made all quiet round about, that he might build a house to his Name, and prepare the Sanctuary for ever: How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with understanding, as with a flood? Thy mind covered the whole Earth, and hath filled it with grave and dark sentences. Thy Name went abroad in the Isles, and for thy peace thou wast beloved, &c. But thus he concludeth: Thou didst bow thy loins to Women, and wast overcome by thy body; thou didst stain thy body; thou didst stain thine honour, and hast defiled thy posterity, and hast brought wrath upon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy folly, cap. 27.

SECT. VI.

Of the Contemporaries of Solomon.

Near the beginning of Solomon's reign, Agathias the third of the Heracidae in Corinth, Labotes in Lacedæmon, and soon after Silvius Alba, the fourth of the Silvii, swayd those Kingdoms: Longibones then governing Alfria, Agathis and Archiphus the second and third Princes after Codrus, ruling the Athenians.

In the six and twentieth of Solomon's reign, Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Balthazarius succeeded, and reigned seventeen years, after Mercatori account; who reckons the time of his Rule by the age of his Sons. Jephthah gives him fewer years. Theophilus Antiochenus against Antonicus, finds Bozartus the next after Hiram, if there be not some Kings omitted between the death of Hiram and the reign of Bozartus.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Solomon, Sefac or Shishak (as our English Geneva terms him) began to govern in Egypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sofachis; Jephthah, Sufac; Cedrenus, Sisifmus; Eusebius in the column of the Egyptian Kings, Smedas; and in that of the Hebrews, Sufac. Jephthah in the eighth of his Antiquities, reproveh it as an error in Herodotus, that he ascribeth the Acts of Sufac to Sesphris, which perchance Herodotus might have done by comparison, accounting Sefac another Sesphris, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and virtues of King Sesphris, I have spoken already in the story of the Egyptian Princes: only in this he was removed; that he caused four of his captive Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be seen and to ride in triumph: one of which four, saith Entropius, at such time as Sesphris was carried out to take the air, cast his head continually back upon the two foremost wheels next him; which Sesphris perceiving, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion: To whom the captive King answered, That in those he beheld the infallibility of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheel was suddenly carried about, and became the highest, and the uppermost part was as suddenly turned downward, and under all: which when Sesphris had judiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like servitude in the future. Of this Sesphris, and that he could not be taken for Sefac, I have spoken at large in that part of the Egyptian Kings preceding.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Solomons Successors until the end of Jehophaph.

SECT. I.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings; the defection of the ten Tribes, and Jeroboams Idolatry.

REhoboam the Son of Solomon by Nahama an Ammonitess, now forty years old, succeeded his Father Solomon, and was anointed at Shechem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the return of Jeroboam as yet in Egypt, since he fled thither, fearing Solomon. After his arrival the People presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sic enim firmus est fove Imperium, si amoris mallet quam metus; So should his Empire (saith Jephthah) be more assured, if he desired rather to be beloved than feared: Wherefore he took three days to deliberate before his answer; of whom therefore it could not be said as of David, that he was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himself he knew not how to resolve, so had he not the judgment to discern of Counsel; which is the very test of Wisdom in Princes, and in all Men else. But notwithstanding that he had consulted with those grave and advised Men, that served his Father, who perfwaded him by all means to satisfy the multitude: He was transported by his families and favourites, not only to continue on the backs of his Subjects those burdens which greatly cruel them; but (vaunting fallacy of greatness exceeding his Fathers) he threatened in sharp, or rather in terrible terms, to lay yet heavier, and more unfupportable loads on them. But as it appeared in the success, those younger advisers greatly mistook the nature of severity, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty it self: They also were ignorant that it ought to be used for the help, and not for the harm of Subjects. For what is the strength of a King left by his People? His witsless Parafites could well judge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and enabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehoboam did not a little advance Jeroboams designs. For being fore-foretold by the Prophet Abdiel of his future advancement, these the Kings threats (changing the Peoples love into fury) confirmed and gave courage to his hopes of Israel: the People cried out, What portion have we in David? we have no inheritance in the Son of Abi. Now though themselves, even all the Tribes of Israel, had consented to David anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his Bones and his Flesh: Yet now after the manner of Rebels, they forgot both the bond of Nature, and their duty to God; and as all alienate resolved hearts do, they served themselves for the present, with impudent excuses. And now over-late, and after-time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the People, a Man most hateful to all his Subjects, to pacify them: whom they indantly beat to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Siechem with all speed; and recovered Jerusalem, where preparing to invade Israel, with an hundred and thousand chosen Men, Shimei in the Person of God, commanding: to the contrary, all was layd for the present. In the mean time Jeroboam the new King fortified Siechem on this side, and Penuel on the other side of Jordan; and fearing that the Union and exercise of one Religion would also join the Peoples hearts again to the House of David, and having in all likelihood also promoted the Egyptians to follow their Idolatry, he set up two Calves of Gold for the Children of Israel to worship, impiously persuading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these he represented those Gods which delivered them out of Egypt, and refusing the service of the Levites, he made Priests in for such gods. It must needs be, that by banishing the Levites which served David and Solomon through all Israel, Jeroboam greatly enriched himself: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were given them by Mose and Joshua, for as it is written, The Levites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Juda, &c. This Irreligious policy of Jeroboam (which was the foundation of Idolatry that never could be rooted out, until Israel, for it was rooted out of the Land) was by Prophetic Miracles impugned sufficiently when it first began; but the afflictions maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophetic nor Miracle could make them yield. Jeroboam could not be moved now by the Authority of Abi, who from the Lord had first promised unto him the Kingdom; nor by the withering of his own hand as he stretched it over the Altar, which all clearly find according to the sign, which the Man of God had given him by the commandment of God; who again recovered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, so he held it the safest policy to proceed as he had begun. This impious invention of Jeroboam, who forsok God, and the Religion of his fore-Fathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a modern Historian compared with the policies of late Ages: observing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian born. Sic qui loquitur (saith he) Politici vocantur, & propria commodi presensque utilitas sibi tanquam ultimum finem constituent, causam quam vocant statim in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tunc, promittenda, conservanda, amplianda nihil non facient, dum putant. Si ipsius proximo irroganda, si justitia bonificanda legem subvertenda, si religio ipsa pessandenda, si deique omnia pars Divina & humana violanda, nihil innotuit, nil per fas nefasque relinquendum consensit, emulatur, omnia percontant: nihil ad ipsos, modo id quod est resus esse sibi persuadent, obtinent, ac si nullus sit qui ius lia curat, castigare possit Deus: So they who are now called Politicians, propounding to themselves, as their utmost end and scope, their own commodity and present profit, are wot to alledge the cause of state for such, as the principal point to be regarded: For the good of the State, for advancing, preserving, or encreasing of the State, they think that they may do anything. If they mean to oppress their Neighbour, to overturn all Laws of Justice and equity, if Religion it self must go to wrack, yet, if all rights of God and Man must be violated, they will try all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will do any thing: let all go to wrack, unless care they, so long as they may have what they would: as now should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeed this allegation of Ragione del stato, did serve as well to uphold, as at the first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatry of the ten Tribes. Upon this ground Amaziah the Priest of Babel confuted the Prophet Amos not to prophesie at Babel; For (saith he) it is the Kings Court. Upon this Ground even John that had massacred the Priests of Babel, in zeal for the Lord, yet would not in any vile depart from that politique sin of Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, which made Israel to sin. It was reason of State that persuaded the last French King Henry the fourth to change his Religion, yet the Protestants whom he forsok, obeyed him, yet the Protestants whom he followed, murdered him. So strongly doth the painted Vizard of policy proceeding, delude even those that know the foul face of impiety lurking under it: And behold the wretched ends that have ever followed it, whereof John, and all the Kings of Israel had, and were themselves very great examples.

SECT. II.

Of Rehoboam his impiety; for which he was punished by Sefac: Of his ends, and Contemporaries.

While Jeroboam was occupied in setting up his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other side, having now little hope to recover the Provinces lost, strengthened the principal places remaining, with all endeavour; for he fortified and victualled fifteen Cities of Juda and Benjamin: Not that he feared Jeroboam alone, but the Egyptians, to whom Jeroboam had not only furnished himself, but wished invitation to invade Judea: laying perchance, before them the uncountable Riches of David and Solomon, which might now be easily had, being ten of the twelve Tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Judeans. So as by those two ways (of late years often trodden) to wit, change of Religion, and invitation of foreign Force, Jeroboam hoped to settle himself in the Seat of Israel, whom yet the powerful God for his Idolatry in few years after he rooted out, with all his. Rehoboam having also, as he thought, by Fortifying divers places, assured his Estate, forsok the Law of the Living God, and made High Places, and Images, and Groves, on every high Hill, and under every green Tree.

And therefore in the fifth year of his Reign, Sefac a King, or Shibac before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom, as well Adad of Idumea, as Jeroboam, were familiar, and his Instruments, entered Judea: with twelve thousand Chariots, and Infantry, three score thousand Horfes, besides Foot-Men, which which Josaphat numbers at four hundred thousand. This Army was compounded of four Nations: Egyptians, Libanians, Suceans, and Cushites. The Libanians were Libanites, the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the West side. The Libanians were of Petræa, and of the Desert Arabia, which afterwards followed Zera against Aza King of Juda. The Suceans according to Justin his opinion, were of Suecia, which signifieth Tents: He doth suppose that they were the Troglodites, mentioned often in Pliny, Ptolemy, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not far from the Banks of the red Sea, in 22 Degrees from the line Northward, about six hundred English miles from the beiti and Marimacate part of Egypt: and therefore I do not think that the Suceans or Sucei were those Troglodites, but rather those Arabians which Ptolemy calls Arabæ Egyptiæ Ischthopolis, which posses that part of Egypt behind the Mountains called Adiabitis, and the Red Sea, far nearer Egypt, and readier to be levied, than those removed Savages of the Troglodites.

With this great and powerful Army, Sefac invaded Judea, and (besides many other strong Cities) was Jerusalem itself, of which and of the Temple, and Kings house, he took the spoil, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden Shields which Solomon had made, in imitation of those which David recovered from Adadazer, in the Syrian war: these Rehoboam supplied with Targets of brass, which were inough to guard a King of his quality, whom Syriac calleth, The Foolishness of the People.

From this time forward the King of Egypt claimed the sovereignty of Judea, and held the Jews as their Tributaries: Sefac, as it seems, rendering up to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the Word of God, where premising the deliverance of Juda after their humiliation, he doth notwithstanding leave them under the yoke of Egypt, in these words, Nevertheless they (to wit, the Judeans) shall be his servants, that is, the servants of Sefac.

After this overthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam reigned twelve years, and his losses received by Sefac notwithstanding, he continued the War against Jeroboam all his life-time. After his death Jeroboam governed Israel four years.

Rehoboam lived 58 years, and reigned 17, his Body was written at large by Shemajah and Hiddan the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan, and the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Tesippus, the third and fourth Arabians, or Governors for life after Codrus, governed in Athens. Abdastarnus, or Abstratus, in Tyre Dorijebus, the fifth of the Heraclide in Sparta, according to Ensebius (others make him the sixth) and Primus the fourth in Corinth. Over the Lutins, reigned Silvius Alba, Silvius Atys, the fourth and the fifth of the Silvii.

About the 12 of Rehoboam, Abdastarnus King of Tyre was murdered by his Nurses sons, or Followers, brethren, the elder of which usurped the Kingdom twelve years.

Toward his latter times, Pericades, or Pyribidates, began to Govern Assyria, the 34th King thereof: And not long after Asturnus, the King of Babylonia, recovered the Kingdom of Tyre from the Ursurpers.

SECT. III.

Of the great Batel between Jeroboam and Abia, with a Collation of the Examples of Gods Judgment.

Abijah the son of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdom, and his vices. He raised an Army of four hundred thousand, with which he invaded Jeroboam, who encountered him with a double number of eight hundred thousand: Both Armies joyed near to the Mount Ephraim, where Jeroboam was utterly overthrown, and the strength of Israel broken: For there fell of that side five hundred thousand; the greatest overthrow that ever was given or received of those Nations. Abijah being now Master of the Field, recovered Babel, Jehonab, and Ephraim. Soon after which discomfiture, Jeroboam died: who reigned in all 22 years. Abijah, the better to strengthen himself, entered into League with Hezion, the third of the Adams of Syria, as may be gathered out of the 2 of Chron. He reigned but three years, and then died. The particulars of his Acts 16: 23 were written by Iddo the Prophet, as some parts of his Fathers were.

Here we likewise pleaed God to punish the sins of Solomon in his son Rehoboam: First, by an Idolater and Traytor: And then by the Successor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Solomon had married, thereby the better to assure his Estate, which while he served God was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings, and when he forsok him, it was torn away by his meanest Vassals. Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sefac: For the son Abijah was able to levy two hundred thousand Men, and with the same number he overthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and flew of them five hundred thousand: God giving spirit, courage, and invention, when and where it pleased him. And as in those times the causes were expell, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People: the same being both before, and at that instant delivered by Prophets: So the same Just God, who Liveth and Governeth all things for ever, doth in these our times give Victory, Courage, and Discomfiture, Raife, and throw down Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: For which reason, in these and other the afflictions of Israel, always the causes are set down, that they might be as preludens to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in David's time for three years, For Saul and his bloody house, &c. And David towards the latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrows in effect, for Uriah, Solomon had ten Tribes of twelve torn from his son for his Idolatry. Rehoboam was spoiled of his Riches and Honour by Sefac of Egypt, because the People of Juda made Images, High Places, and Groves, &c. and because they suffered Sodomites in the Land. Jeroboam was punished in his Idolatry, and his Politicity, for the Golden Calves he erected. Joram had all his Sons slain by the Philistines, and his very Bowels torn out of his Body by an Excoriating Flux, for murdering his Brethren. Abab and Jezabel were slain, the Blood of one, the Body of the other eaten with Dogs, for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punned the same, and the like sins in all After-times, and in these our days by the same Famine, Plagues, War, Loss, Vexation, Death, Sicknes and Calamities: howsoever the Wife Men of the World raise these effects and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing under new up-starts, more than to call their eyes upon that Royal house of David, from which the fixation of five Kings in legal descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly have been laid upon the mean beginnings thereof. To think that Omeri had prevented his Competitors in making peace with Asa, were a conjecture more bold than plausible. For Omeri was not only an Idolater, but did worse than all that were before him; as which it might serve alone to prove, that Asa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, for the course which he professed to take at the very first, of revenging the massacre committed upon the family and friends of Baasha (Asa's mortal enemy) gives manifestation, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should more justly than he have expected the friendship of Juda in that quarrel. Wherefore in reaching out the reason of this backwardness in the ten Tribes (which was such, that they may seem to have never thought upon the matter) to submit themselves to their true Princes: it were not anulus to examine the causes moving the people to reverse the death of Eli, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the son Jeroboam, who followed the Worsen person as a man of spirit and courage. Surely it is apparent, that the very first detection of the 10 Tribes, was (if we look upon humane reason) occasioned by desire of breaking that heavy yoke of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their necks. Their desire was to have a King that should not oppress them: nor to have no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Rehoboam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediately choose Jeroboam in his stead, as a man likely to afford that liberty unto them for which he had contended in their behalf. Neither were they (as it seems) herein altogether deceived. For his affection of popularity appears in his building of decayed Towers, and in the institution of his new devised Idolatry; wherewith he told the people, that it was too much for them to travel so far as to Jerusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to scale towards the latter end of his reign, and of his sons reign, when long time of possession had confirmed his title, which at the first was only good by courtesy of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in such cases) were more contented by some prerogatives of a King, that he still retained in his own hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens, it is clearly apparent, that the whole Army of all Israel joined with Baasha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and crucifixion of Jeroboam's house.

Now the reign of Baasha himself, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) every way unfortunate; his labour and cost at Rama was call away; the other side of his Kingdom harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one Town of Gibbethon from the Philistines, but left that business to his son, who likewise appears an unprofitable sluggard. Wherefore it must needs be, that the favour of the people toward the house of Baasha grew from his good form of Civil Government, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Jeroboam ever meant to do. And surely he that shall take pains to look into those examples which are extant of the different courts, held by the Kings of Israel and Juda, in administration of justice, will find it most probable, that upon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued so averse from the line of David: as to think all adversity more tolerable, than the weighty Scepter of that house. For the death of Joab and Shimei was indeed by them detested; yet in that they sifted it without form of judgment, they suffered life unto man innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without judgment, and without any crime objected, other than the Kings jealousy: out of which by the same rule of arbitrary justice (under which it may be supposed that many were call away) he would have slain Jeroboam (if he could have caught him) before he had yet committed any offence; as appears by his contented return out of Egypt, like one that was known to have ended wrong, having not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Jeroboam did upon his brethren, and upon sundry of his greatest men; as also Joab did so put to death Zababai the son of Jehoiada, who had made him King, even in the court of the house of the Lord: and Manasse did shed innocent blood exceeding much, till he replanted Jerusalem from corner to corner; and this was imputed to him as another fault; besides his sin, wherewith he made Juda to sin. Contrariwise, among the Kings of Israel we find no monument of such arbitrary proceeding, unless perhaps the words of Jeroboam the son of Asa (which were but words) may be taken for an instance, when he said, God do so to me, and more also, if the head of Eliha the son of Shaphat shall stand on him this day. whereby it is not plain whether he meant to kill him without more ado, or to have him condemned as a false Prophet, that had made them hold out against the Assyrians, till they were fain to eat their own children; which he thought a sufficient argument to prove, that it was not Gods purpose to deliver them. The death of Nadab sheweth rather the liberty which the Israelites enjoyed, than any peremptory execution of the Kings will. For Nadab did not fail to stand upon his own right, though Asa were even fain for anger; neither was he forced that cause put to death, as upon commandment, but made away by conspiracy, the matter being handled after a judicial form, which might give satisfaction to the people, ignorant of the device, though to God it could not.

The murder of the Prophets is continually ascribed to Jezabel, an impudent Woman, and not unto the King, her husband. Neither is it certain, that there was no Law made whereby their lives were taken from them; but certain it is, that the people being Idolaters, were both pleased with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Juda (such as are required) prove them to use a more absolute manner of command, than the Kings of the ten Tribes. Neither do their sufferings witness the contrary. For of those which reigned over Juda, from the division of the Kingdom, to the captivity of the ten Tribes, three were slain by the people, and two were denied a burial amongst their Ancestors. Yea, the death of Ahaziah and his brethren, slain by Joab, with the destruction of all that Royal seed of Ahaziah, did not (for ought that we can read) stir up in the people any such thirst of revenge, as might by the suddenness and uniformity tell the affection to be general, and proceeding from a loving remembrance of their Princes: unless we should think that the death of Ahaziah, after seven years reign, were occasioned rather by the memory of her ill punishing, than by the present sense of her tyrannical abusing the government, wherewith she had sinned. On the other side, such of the Kings of Israel as perished by treason (which were seven of the twenty) were all slain by the conspiracy of the great men, who assisted by treason to the Crown: the people being so far from embracing their hands in the blood of their Sovereigns, that (after Nadab) they did never forbear to revenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their their power; nor approve the good success of treason, unless forced compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being thoroughly revenged upon other two, namely the death of Eli and Zababai, upon Zimri and Shallum, who traitorously got and usurped, for a little while, their places; only three of the seven remain, whose ends the people took, it may be doubtful. Though indeed it is precisely said in the slaughter committed on Ahab's children by Jehu, that the people durst not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly afraid: and the same fear might be in them at the death of Pekah, whose History (as others of that time) is curiously passed over. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England, that never any of them perished by fury of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them; neither was there any motive urging so forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in prison, as fear left the people should stir in their quarrel. And certainly (howsoever all that the Law calls treason, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which have here most prevailed, the fury of the multitude hath quenched it self with the blood of some great Officers; no such rebellions, howsoever wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruin of their natural Sovereign, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten upon his Royal person; which if any man impute unto gross ignorance, another may if more charitably, and I think, more truly, ascribe to a reverent affection. Wherefore that Fable of Briareus, who, being loosed by Pallas, did with his 100 hands give assistance to Jupiter, when all the rest of the gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying that Monarchies need not to fear any curbing of their absoluteness by mighty subjects, as long as by wisdom they keep the hearts of the people, who will be sure to come in on their side. Though indeed the Story might very well have born the same interpretation, as it is rehearsed by Homer, who tells us that Pallas was one of the conspiracy, and that These alone did mar all their practice, by loosening Briareus. For a good Form of Government sufficeth by it self to retain the people, not only without assistance of a laborious Wit, but even against all devices of the greatest and shrewdest Politicians: every Sheriff and Countable, being fitter able to arm the multitude, in the Kings behalf, than any over-weening Rebel, how mighty soever, can against him.

This declaration of the peoples love, being seldom found in Juda, makes it very likely, that the rule it self of government there was such, as neither gave occasion of contentment unto the subjects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the Kings. Upon which reasons it may seem that the multitude was kept usually diffamed. For otherwise it would have been almost impossible, that Athalia the sister of Ahab, a stranger to the Royal blood of Juda, should by the only authority of a Queen-mother have destroyed all the seed of David, and usurped the Kingdom very near 7 Years, without finding any resistance. Yea when Jehoiada the high Priest had agreed with the Captains and principal men of the Land to set up Joash their lawful King, wherewith the whole Nation were generally well affected, he was fain to give to these Captains and their men, the swords and the spears that were King David's, and were in the house of the Lord. But we need not enter into such particulars. Questionless, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their duty toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their own choice or admission, holding the Crown by a more uncertain tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the ten Tribes did never seek to return to their ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their first Kings, which died in the reign of Asa, admitted a seventh of a new Family, rather than they would submit themselves with those of Juda and Benjamin, under a more honourable, but more heavy yoke.

So Asa having lived the death of 7 Kings of Israel, died himself at one and forty years reign, leaving Jehoshaphat his son to deal with Ahab the son of Omeri, who was the eighth King over the ten Tribes.

SECT. VII.

Of Jehoshaphat and his Contemporaries.

Jehoshaphat, who succeeded Asa, was a Prince religious and happy, he destroyed all the Groves, Altars, and high places dedicated to Idolatry, and sent Teachers to all places and people wanting instruction; he recovered the tribute due unto him by the Arabians and Philistines: from the one he had silver, from the other sheep and goats to the number of fifteen thousand and four hundred. The numbers of men of War were more than admirable; for it is written that Ahab had the two hundred and fourscore thousand, Jehoshaphat of two hundred and fourscore thousand, and Ahasa of two hundred thousand: also that he had, besides these in Benjamin, of those that bare shields, which we call Targeteers, and of Archers under Eladai, two hundred thousand, and under the commandment of Jehozabab a hundred and fourscore thousand: which numbers together make eleven hundred and sixty thousand, all which are said to have waited upon the King, besides his Garrison.

That Juda and Benjamin, a Territory not much exceeding the County of Kent, should muster eleven hundred and sixty thousand fighting men, it is very strange, and the number far greater than it was found upon any other view. Joab in David's time found five hundred thousand: Rehoboam found but a hundred and fourscore thousand: Abia four hundred and eight thousand: Asa five hundred and fourscore thousand: Amaria intoll'd all that could bear arms, and they amounted to three hundred thousand. Surely, whereas it is written that when news was brought to Jehoshaphat that Morb and Ammon were entered his Territory to the West of Jordan, and that their numbers were many, he feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that he would have feared even the Army of Xerxes, if he could have brought into the field the 11 hundred and 60 thousand fighting men, leaving all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (reverting my self to better judgment) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the 17 distributed to several Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the 300 thousand under Adnah, and the 200 and fourscore thousand under Jehoshaphat, were afterward commanded and mulctured by Ahasa, Eladai, and Jehozabab: for the gross and total is not in that place set down, as it was under the other Kings formerly named. Again, as the aids which Jehoshaphat brought to Ashdod did not show that he was a Prince of extraordinary power, so the Mosabites and Ammonites which he feared, could never make the conquest of those numbers, which he that commanded the army among Jehoshaphat's Leaders had under him.

This mighty Prince, notwithstanding his greatness, yet he joyed in friendship with Abab King of Israel, who had married that wicked Woman Jezebel. Him Jehoshaphat visited at Samaria, and caused his son Joram to marry Abhalia, this Abab's Daughter. Abab persuaded Jehoshaphat to assist him in the War against the Syrians, who held the City of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together four hundred of his Prophets, or Basilees, to fore-tell the success: who promised him Victory. But Jehoshaphat believed nothing at all in those diviners, but resolved first of all to consult with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Hereupon Abab made answer that he had one called Micahiah, but he hated that Prophet, because he always fore-told of evil, and never of any good towards him. Yet Micahiah was sent for to the King: but by the way the messenger prayed him to confer with the rest of the Prophets, and to promise Victory unto them, as they did. But Micahiah spoke the truth, and repeated his Vision to both the Kings, which was, that God would who shall persuade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth Gilead: to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that he would enter into his Prophets, and be in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus pater vestri loquitur in vobis, it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father speaks in you: so in a contrary kind did the devil in the Prophets of Baal, or Satan, encourage Abab to his destruction. And as P. Marry upon this place well observeth, these evil spirits are ministers of Gods vengeance, and are used as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime employ, for as it pleaseth God by his good Angels, to save and deliver from destruction, of which the Scriptures have many examples: so on the contrary, it is by the evil that he punisheth and destroyeth: both which are said to perform the Will of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Ecdoliaphan remembereth a second sort of malignant natures, but they are every-where visible. There are spirits, faith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on fire strokes. In the time of destruction they shew forth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Micahiah having by this his revelation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets, whose spirit he discovered, was stricken by Zadiah one of Baal's Prophets, and by Abab himself committed to prison: where he appointed him to be relieved and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Micahiah, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou return in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me. Nevertheless Abab went on in that War, and was wounded to death. Jehoshaphat returned to Jerusalem, where he was reprehended by Jehoi the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

After this the Arames or Damascenes, joined with the Moabites, Ammonites and Idumeans to invade Judea: who pass Jordan and encamp at Engaddi: and when Jehoshaphat gathered his Army, the Prophet Jahaziel came-told him of the Victory, which should be obtained without any blood-shed of his part: and so when Jehoshaphat approached, this Assembly of Nations the Ammonites and Moabites, disputing with the Idumeans, and quarrelling for some causes among themselves, thereof Ammon and Moab set upon the Idumeans and brake them utterly: which done, they also invaded each other: in which broil Jehoshaphat arriving, took the spoil of them all without any loss of his part, as it was fore-told and promised by God. Notwithstanding this Victory, Jehoshaphat, forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for assisting an idolatrous King, did notwithstanding join with Obadiah, the son of Abab, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophe, hoping of the like return which Solomon had: but as Elizeus the Prophet fore-told him, his ships perished, and were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and so that enterprise was overthrown.

Yet he taketh part with Jehoram, the brother of Obadiah, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Juda and Israel, the Edomites join their Forces, not forgetting, it seems, that the Moabites, assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their Army. The Moabites, subjects to David and Solomon, forsaking the Kings of Juda, gave themselves their vassals to Jehoram, and so they continued to his successors till the death of Abab: but Jehoshaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatry of his Collage, yet as it cometh he was drawn into this War, both to be avenged of the Moabites for their defection from Juda to Israel, as also because they had lately joyed themselves with the Syrians against Jehoshaphat, and thirdly, to punish their double rebellion who first forsook Juda, and now Israel.

Both Kings resolved to pass by the way of Idumea, thereby the better to assure that Nation: for we find that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi against Jehoshaphat: But whether they had then declared themselves against Jehoshaphat, is not certain: for in the 2 of Chron. 11. ver. 8. it is written, that in the time of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat, Edom rebelled: and therefore it cometh to me that the Edomites, when they were slain by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to return from them, and to join themselves with the Army of Juda. For, that they were numbered among the enemies of Jehoshaphat, it is plain in the 2 of Chron. the 20. and as plain 2. 1. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Jehoshaphat's death. Now in the passage of these Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the year, or whether the Idumeans having a purpose to rebel, misled the Army of Juda and Israel, with intent to infest them for want of Water: true it is, that they suffered the same, if not a greater thirst than the Armies of Cyrus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions: and had all likelihood utterly perished, had not Elisab taught them to cut trenches whereinto the water sprang, by which not only Jehoshaphat and his Army, but Jehoram King of Israel an Idolater was relieved: the great mercy and goodness of God having ever been prone to save the evil for the good, whereas he never destroyed the good for the evil.

The miserable issue of this War, and how Moab burnt his son, or the son of the King of Edom, for sacrifice, on the rampire of his own City, I have already written in the life of Jehoram among the Kings of Israel. Jehoshaphat reigned 25 Years and died: he was buried in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and a part of the Pyramis let over his grave is yet to be seen, faith the Son of Hanan. His acts are written at large by Jehoi the son of Hanan.

There lived with Jehoshaphat, Ophe prince in Assyria, Capeus, and Tibirinus Kings of the Albans in Italy: of the latter, the river Tiber (formerly Albulus) took name.

In Jehoshaphat's time also ruled Mecades or Mizades in Athen: Agelas or Agellian in Corinth: and Archilum of the same race of the Heracleids the seventh in Lacedaemon. Badsirus ruled the Tyrans: Abab, Obadiah and Jehoram the Israelites.

CHAP.

CHAP. XX.

Of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat, and Ahazia.

SECT. I.

That Jehoram was made King Jundry times.

Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat King of Juda, began his reign at thirty two years of age, and lived until he was forty years old, being eight years a King: But of these eight years, which Jehoram is said to have reigned, four are to be reckoned in the life of his Father, who going to the Syrian War with Abab, left this Jehoram King in his stead, as Abab did his son Abazia. This appears by the several beginnings, which are given in Scripture to the two Jehorams Kings of Israel and Juda, and to Abazia the eldest son of Abab. For Abazia is said to have begun his reign, in the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat. Jehoram the Brother of Abazia succeeded him in the 2 year of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat King of Juda: that is, in the next year after that Jehoram of Juda was designated King by his Father: it being (as we find elsewhere) the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat himself, who went with the Syrians against Moab. Hereby it appears that the full power and execution of the royal Office was retained still by Jehoshaphat, who governed absolutely by himself, not communicating the rule with his son. But in the fifth year of Jehoram King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Jehoshaphat, the old King took unto him, as Partner in the Government, this his eldest son, who was at that time 32 years old, his father being 57. Now for as much as Jehoshaphat reigned 25 years, it is evident that his son did not reign alone till the eighth of Jehoram King of Israel. The like regard is to be had in accounting the times of other Kings of Juda and Israel, who did not always reign precisely so long as their years of the Text may seem at first to affirm: but their years were sometimes confounded, sometimes only current, sometimes confounded with the years of their successors or foregoers, and must therefore be found by comparing their times with the years of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing less needful than curious, to enquire into the reasons moving Jehoshaphat either to assume unto him his son as Partner in the Kingdom, whilst he was able himself to command both in Peace and in War, the like having never been done by any of his Progenitors, or having once (in the 17 of his reign) vouchsafed unto him that honour, to re-sume it to himself, or at least wife to defer the confirmation of it, until four or five years were passed. Yet so far as to enter into the examination of these passages, may be a mean to find more light, whereby we may more clearly discover the causes of much extraordinary business ensuing, I hold it not unaim to make such conjecture, as the circumstances of the story briefly handled in the Scriptures may seem to approve.

We are therefore to consider, that this King Jehoshaphat was the first of Rehobams issue, that ever entered into any straight league with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much labour and long War, tired themselves in vain, making small profit of the greatest advantages that could be wished. Wherefore Jehoshaphat thought it the wisest way, to make a League offensive and defensive between Israel and Juda, whereby each might enjoy their own in quiet.

This confederacy made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true root and fountain of all Wisdom: Yet as a piece of sound policy, doubtless it wanted not due pretences of much common good thereby likely to arise, with mutual fortification of both those Kingdoms, against the uncommunicated Nations their ancient Enemies. This apparent benefit, being so inestimable a jewel, that it might not easily be lost, but continue as hereditary from Father to Son, it was thought a very good course to have it confirmed by some sure Bond of Affinity, and therefore was Abhalia the Daughter of Omnias a Sister of Abab King of Israel, given in marriage to Jehoram, who was Son and Heir apparent to the King of Juda. This Lady was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queen Jezebel her brothers Wife, that she did not disdain to take upon herself, to perform a great deal more in Jerusalem, than the other knew how to compass in Samaria. She was indeed a Firebrand ordained by God to consume a great part of the noblest Houses in Juda, and perhaps of those Men or their Children, whose worldly wisdom, regardless of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

The first fruits of this great League, was the Syrian War at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Juda and Israel did adventure equally, but the profit of the Victory should have redounded wholly to Abab: As Godly Princes very seldom thrive by matching with Idolaters, but rather have the turn of those false Friends, who being ill affected to God himself cannot be well affected to his Servants. Between their setting forth, Abab designed, as King, his Son Abazia's not so much perhaps in regard of the uncertain events of War (for none of his Predecessors had ever done the like, upon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Micahiah (for he despised to take) as inviting Jehoshaphat by his own Example, to take the same course, wherein he prevailed.

SECT.

SECT. II.

Probable conjectures of the motives inducing the old King Jehoshaphat to change his purpose often, in making his son Jehoram King.

Many arguments do very strongly prove Jehoram to have been wholly over-ruled by his Wife, especially for his forsaking the Religion of his Godly Ancestors, and following the abominable superstitions of the house of Ahab.

That she was a Woman of intollerable pride, and abhorring to live a private life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vain matter she was able to produce, whereby to make her Husband think that his Brethren and Kindred were but mean and unworthy Persons in comparison of him, and of his Children, which were begotten upon the Daughter and Sister of two great Kings, not upon base Women, and mean subjects. The Court of Ahab, and his many Victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad were matter sufficient to make an insolent man think highly of himself, as being allied to honourably, who could otherwise have found in his heart well enough, to despise all his Brethren, as being the eldest, and Heir apparent to the Crown, whereto already he had, in a manner, the possession.

How soon his vices brake out, or how long he dissembled them and his Idolatrous Religion, it cannot certainly be known. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did very soon make his Fathers eyes to water: who thereupon caused the young Man to know himself better, by making him call back into rank among his younger Brethren. And surely the doings of Jehoshaphat about the same time, argue no small displeasure of the whole Country, through the misgovernment of his ungodly son. For the good King was fain to make his progress round about the Land, reclaiming the People unto the Service of God, and appointing Judges throughout all the strong Cities of Juda, City by City. This had been a needful labour, if the Religion taught and strongly maintained by Ahab, and by himself, had not suffered alteration, and the course of Justice been perverted by the power of such as had born authority. But the necessity that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the King did give by his Judges: and by his commission given to one of the Priests in spiritual causes, and to the Steward of his house in temporal Matters, to be general Overseers.

This was not till after the death of Ahab the son of Ahab: but how long after it is uncertain. For Jehoram the brother of Ahab began his reign (as hath been already noted) in the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat, which was then accounted the second of Jehoram, Jehoshaphat's son, though afterwards this Jehoram of Juda had another first and second year, even in his Fathers time, before he reigned alone, as the best Chronologers and Expositors of the holy Text agree. So he continued in private estate, until the two and twentieth of his Fathers reign, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignity are not set down, yet we may not think, that motives thence, appearing substantial, were wanting. Jehoram of Israel held the same correspondence with Jehoshaphat, that his Father had done: and made use of it. He drew the Judeans into the war of Mosh, at which time it might well be, that the young Prince of Juda was again ordained King by his Father, as in the Syrian expedition he had been. Or it we ought rather to think, that the preparations for the enterprise against Mosh did not occupy so much time, as from the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat, in which year that Nation rebelled against Israel, unto his two and twentieth's yet, the daily negotiations between the two Kings of Juda and Israel, and the affinity between them contracted in the person of Jehoram, might offer some good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certain how the behaviour of the younger sons, in their elder brothers disgrace, might cause their Father to put him in possession for fear of tumult after his death: or the deep dissimulation of Jehoram himself might win the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren: it being a thing usual in mischievous fell natures, to be as abject and servile in time of adversity, as insolent and bloody upon advantage. This is manifest, that being repulsed of his former estate, he demeaned himself in such wise toward his Brethren, as caused their Father to enable them, to not with store of silver and gold, and of precious things, (which kind of liberality other Kings doubtless had used unto his younger sons) but with the custody of strong Cities in Juda, to assure them, if it might have been, by unwonted means, against unwonted perils.

SECT. III.

The doings of Jehoram, when he reigned alone, and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

But all this providence availed nothing: for an higher Providence had otherwise determined of the sequel. When once the good old Man, their Father, was dead, the younger sons of Jehoshaphat found strong Cities, a weak defence, against the power of him unto whom the Cities were obedient. If they came in upon the summons of a King their Brother, then had he them without any more ado: if they stood upon their guard, then were they Traytors, and so unable to hold out against him, who besides his own power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish Kingdom against them: so that the apparent likelihood of their final overthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoever it was, they were all taken and slain, and with them for company many great Men of the Land, such belike as either had taken their part, when the Tyrant sought their lives, or had been appointed Rulers of the Country, when Jehoram was depofed from his Government: in which effice they, without forbearing to do justice, could hardly avoid the doing of many things derogatory to their young Masters which he would now call Treason, saying that he was then King, who durst say the contrary.

After this Jehoram took upon him, as being now Lord alone to make invasions in Religion, wherein he was not contented, as other Idolatrous Princes, to give way and safe conduct unto Superstition and Idolatry, and to provoke and encourage the People to that sin, whereto it is wonderful that they were so much addicted, having such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that above all other sins: but he used compulsion and was it not the very first (the first that is registered, to have set up Idols) by force.

Whilft he was thus busied at home, in doing what he listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad: and having hitherto since David's time, been Governed by a Vice-Roy, did now make unto themselves a King. Against these Jehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots: with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the Rebels to flee into into their places of advantage, whereto he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom he should have subdued, and kept his servants. Now began the Prophecy of Isaac to take effect, wherein he foretold, that Elias in process of time should break the yoke of Jacob. For after this the Edomites could never be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Juda: but held their own so well, that when, after many civil and foreign Wars, the Jews by sundry Nations had been brought low: Antiochus the Edomite, with Hord his son, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Jews, in the despicable age of Isaac, and reigned as Kings, even in Jerusalem it self.

The freedom of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great City within Juda, which in the time of Jehoshaphat was a particular City, to rebel against Jehoram, and let it self in liberty. Libna stood in the confines of Benjamin and of Dan, far from the assistance of any bordering Enemies of Juda, and therefore so unlikely it was to have maintained it self in liberty, that it may seem strange how it could escape from utter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to have been taken by their powerful and thoroughly incensed Lord. The Israelites held such good intelligence at that time with Juda, that he would not have accepted the Town, had it offered it self unto him: Neither do we read that it sought how to cast it self into a new subjection, but continued a free State. The rebellion of it against Jehoram, was, because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers, which I take to have not only been the first and remote cause, but even the next and immediate reason moving the Inhabitants to do as they did: for it was a Town of the Levites: who must needs be driven into great extremities, when a religion, contrary to Gods Law, had not only some allowance to countenance by the King, but compulsive authority to force unto it all that were unwilling. As for the use of the Temple at Jerusalem (which, being devout Men, they might fear to lose by this rebellion) it was never denied to those of the ten revolted Tribes any of the Religious Kings, who rather invited the Israelites thither, and gave them kind entertainment: under Idolaters they must have been without it, whether they lived free, or in subjection. Yet it seems that private reasons were not wanting, which might move them rather to do than suffer that which was unwarrantable. For in the general Visitation before remembrance, wherein Jehoshaphat reformed his Kingdom, the good old King appointing new Governors, and giving them special charge to do Justice without respect of persons, used these words: The Levites shall be Officers before you: Deal good and straight, and do it, and the Lord shall be with you. By these phrases, it seems, that he encouraged them against the more powerful, their just proceedings of his Son: whom if the Levites did (according to the trust imposed in them) neglect in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be even with them, and make them now to feel, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heavy indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) so much belied or molested, may justly seem very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Jehoshaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to have over-whelmed any one Town, and buried it under the earth, which they might well in one Month have cast into it with shovels, by ordinary approaches.

But it seems that of those great numbers which his Father would have Levied, there were not many which Jehoram could well trust: and therefore perhaps he thought it an easier loss, to let one Town go, than to put Weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happiness to be feared than to be loved, are fain themselves to stand in fear of those by whom they might have been eradicated into others.

SECT. IV.

Of the miseries falling upon Jehoram, and of his death.

These afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the mind of the wicked Prince: a Prophecy in writing was delivered to him, which threatened both his People, his Children, his Wives, and his own Body. Hereby likewise it appears that he was a cruel Persecutor of Gods Servants: in as much as the Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his Predecessors, both good and evil Kings: but were fain to denounce Gods Judgments against him by Letters, keeping themselves close and far from him. This Epistle is said to have been sent unto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elisha prophesied in his stead before this time, even in the days of Jehoshaphat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this Prophecy in writing behind him, or that (as some conjecture) the error of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we read Elias for Elisha. Induced any thing may rather be believed, than the Tradition held by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that Elias from Heaven did find this Epistle: a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladys letters, devised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from Heaven to St. Giles.

But whosoever was the Author of this threatening Epistle, the accomplishment of the Prophecy was as terrible as the Sentence. For the Philistines and Arabians brake into Juda, and took the Kings House, whereto they found all, or many of his Children, and Wives, all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his Goods. These Philistines had not reclaimed since the time of David, to make an offensive War till now for they were by him almost confounded, and had lost the best of their Towns, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small Territories, by defensive arms, to which they were constrained at Gibbion by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to have been then, as they are now, a naked People, all Horsemen, and ill appointed: their Country affording no other furniture, than such as might nake them enter to rob and spoil in the open fields, than to offend among Cities, such as were thick set in Juda. True it is, that in Ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the World then known, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Cities. But it must be considered, that this was when they had learned of the Romans the Art of War: and that the Provisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Province, did make them able and skillful in pursuing their conquest, and going on into Regions far removed from them. At this day having lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as live in Arabia it self are good Horsemen, but ill appointed: very dangerous to passagers, but unable to deal with good Soldiers.

as tiding stark naked, and rather trusting in the swift-ness of their Horses than in any other means of resistance, where they are well opposed. And such, or little better, may they seem to have been, that spoiled Judah in the time of Jehoram. For their Country was always barren and desert, wanting manual Arts wherby to supply the naturals with furniture: neither are their bands named as chief in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may infer, that one half, yea, or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Juda and Benjamin under Jehoshaphat (wherein were enrolled three hundred and eighty thousand fighting Men) had been enough to have driven away far greater Forces than these Enemies are likely to have brought into the field, had not the People been unable to deal with them, for lack of Weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes jealousie, as in Saul's time by the policy of the Philistims.

It may seem that the house of the King which these Invaders took, was not his Palace in Jerusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Country, where his Wives and Children at that time lay for their recreation: because we read not that they did sack the City, or spoil the Temple, which would have invited them to a more commodious booty, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they took Jerusalem as felt by surprise, the People being disarmed, and the Kings guard too weak to keep them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous: and therefore having done what spoil they could, withdrew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to convey away.

The slaughter committed by Jehu on the two and forty brethren of Ahaziah, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers sons, and the cruel massacre wherein all the Royal Seed perished (only Jos excepted) under the tyranny of Ahaziah, following within two years after this invasion of the Philistims and Arabians, make it seem probable, that the Sons of Jehoram were not all slain at once, but that rather the first murder began in his own time, and was seconded by many other heavy blows, wherewith this house was incessantly stricken, until it was in a manner quite hewed down.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the body of this wicked King, finiting him with a grievous disease in his bowels, which let him not until his guttelle out, and his wretched soul departed from his miserable Carcase. The People of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore he was denied a place or Burial among his Ancestors the Kings of Juda, though his own Son succeeded him in the Kingdom, who was guided by the same spirits that had been his Fathers evil Angels. Ahaziah had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous matting of a dead Husband. She was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintain her own greatness, to retain her Favourites in their Authority, and to place about her Son such Counsellors of the house of Ahab, as were fittest for her turn. Wherefore she thought it unreasonable to make such a do- about a thing of nothing, and offend the Peoples eyes, with a stately Funeral of a Man by them de- fected: But rather chose to let the blame of things passed, be laid on the Dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her self and hers, which it now did concern her to avoid. Such is the quality of wicked Intelligers, having made greedy use of bad Imple- ments, to charge, not only with his own Vices, but with their faults also, the Man whose evil inclinations their finitser counsels have made worse, when once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Jehoram fell out indeed in a bulic time; when his friend and cousin the Israelites who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult War against the Ammites; and therefore could have no better leisure to help Ahaziah, in setting of things according to her own mind, than he had (perhaps through the same hindrance) to help her Husband, when he was distressed by the Philistims. Yea, rather he needed and craved the assistance of the Men of Judah, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly run thither again, unless they were very fairly in- treated.

The acts of this wicked Man, I have thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as far as the circum- stances remembered in holy Scripture would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appear, how the corrupted affections of Men, impugning the revealed Will of God, accomplish nevertheless his hidden purpose, and without miracu- lous means, confound themselves in the seeming- wise devices of their own folly: as likewise to the end that all Men might learn to submit their judgments to the Ordinance of God, rather than to think, that they may safely dispense with his Commandments, and fol- low the prudent conceits which worldly Wisdom dis- tinct into them. For in such kind of unhappy sub- tilities, it is manifest that Ahaziah was able to furnish both her Husband and her Son; but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear, in that which immediately followeth.

SECT. V.

Of the reign of Ahaziah, and his business with the King of Israel.

O Ahaziah, or Ahaziah, the son of Jehoram and Ahaziah, began his reign over Juda, in the twelfth year of Jehoram the son of Ahab King of Israel, and reigned but one year. Touching his age, it is a point of more probable conclusion than importance to know it: yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion than that of Ternulius, alleging the Edition of the Septuaginta at Rome, Anno Domini 1588 which saith that he was twenty years old in the beginning of his Kingdom; and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that do give him two years more. Like enough he is to have been young; for he was governed by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gave him counsel, by which he perished. In matter of Religion, he altered none of his Fathers courses. In matter of State he like- wise upheld the league made with the house of Ahab. He was much busied in doing little, and that with ill success. He accompanied his cousin the Israhelites against Ramoth Gilead, which they won, but not with- out blows; for the Ammites fought so well, that the King of Israel was fain to adventure his own per- son, which escaped not unwounded.

The Town being won, was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to be made by Israhel King of Aras: which done, Jehoram King of Israel withdrew himself to the City of Jezreel, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his Wounds; and Ahaziah returned to Jerusalem. It seems that he was but newly come home (for he reigned in all scanty one year; whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken up a great part) when he did make a new journey, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay fore of his wounds. Belike Ahaziah was brewing some new plots, which his preference would have hindered, and therefore fought every occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vain piece of work to leave his kingdom, having no other business than by way of complement to go see one whom he had seen yesterday. Certain it is, that the Lord had resolved at this time to put in execution that heavy judgment, which he had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet upon the house of Ahab. And hereupon at this time had he disposed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seem to have been accidental, but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing less than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Ahaziah doubtless was one; whose malicious purposes it will shortly be needful, for explanation of some difficulties arising, that we diligently consider and examine.

SECT. VI.

How Ahaziah perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Family was destroyed by Jehu.

he whole Army of Israel, with all the principal Captains, lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elias the Prophet came in among the Captains that were sitting together, who calling out among them Jehu, a principal man, took him apart, and anointed him King over Israel, rehearsing unto him the Pro- phesy of Elias against the house of Ahab, and letting him understand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captains a desire to know the errand, which Jehu thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had over- heard all the talk or no. When he had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forthwith proclaimed him King. For the Pro- phesy of Elias was well known among them, neither durst any one oppose himself against him, that was by God ordained to perform it.

Jehu, who had upon the sudden this great honour thrown upon him, was not slow to put himself in possession of it, but used the first heat of their affec- tion, who joyed with him, in setting on foot the business which nearly concerned him, and was not to be fore- slowed, being no more his own than Gods.

The first care was that no news of the revolt might be carried to Jezreel, whereby the King might have had warning either to fight or flee: this being fore- seen, he marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Jehoram was now so well recovered of his Wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seems that there was much feasting, and joy made, especially by Queen Jezabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Ahaziah coming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queen, as to visit the King.

Certain it is, that since the rebellion of Moab against Israel, the house of Ahab did never so much flourish as at this time. Seventy Princes of the blood Royal at there were that lived in Samaria; Jehoram the son of Queen Jezabel had won Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vain, with loss of his life; and he won it by valiant fight, wherein he received wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amity was so great be- tween Israel and Juda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of success to any rebellious enterpriser: so that now the pro- phesy of Elias might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembered, than as an unlikely tale by them that be- held the majestic face of the Court, wherein for great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and forty Princes of his blood expected.

In the midst of this security, whilst these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about pro- tection of their intents, with against the Ammites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebels and enemies: or else were triumphing in joy of that which was already achieved, and the Queen-mo- ther dressing her self in the bravest manner to come down amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discovered a com- pany coming. These news were not very trouble- some: for the Army that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be ready against all attempts of the Ammites, was likely enough to be discharged upon some notice that the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger coming to Jehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the King as little warning as might be. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance; yet the King to be fatished, sent out another that should bring him word how all went; and he was likewise detained by Jehu. These dumb breds bred some suspicion in Jehoram, whom the Watchman cer- tified of all that happened. And now the company drew so near, that they might, though not perfectly, be discerned, and notice taken of Jehu himself by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to discover any weakness, caused his Chariot to be made ready, and issued forth with Ahaziah King of Juda in his company, whose preference added majesty to his train; when strength or retreat, or expedition to flee, had been more needful. This could not be done so hastily, but that Jehu was come even to the towns end, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Jehoram began to salute Jehu with terms of peace, but receiving a bitter answer, his heart failed him, so that crying out upon the treason to his fellow King, he turned away to have fled. But Jehu overtook him with an arrow, wherewith he struck him dead, and threw his carcass into that field, which, pained with the blood of the right- ful owner, was to be watered with the blood of the unjust possessor. Neither did Ahaziah escape so well, but that he was afflicted by a Wound, which held him till death did seize upon him.

The Kings Palace was joyning to the wall, by the gate of the City, where Jezabel might now be ad- vertised of this calamity, if she did not with her own eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercy, whose judgment, pronounced a- gainst her long before, had overtaken her, when the least expected it. But she, full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her self ready in all haste, and painted her face, hoping with her hateful and impu- rous looks to daunt the Traitor, or at least to utter some Apophthegm that should express her brave spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for ever. Little did she think upon the hungry dogs that were ordained to devour her, whose panches the Israhelites, with which she be befriended her eyes, would more offend, than the folding language wherewith the armed her tongue could trouble the ears of him that had her in his power. As Jehoi drew near, he opened her window, and looking out upon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long enjoyed the fruits of his treason, and murder of the King his Master. This was in meer humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeed a part of miserable folly; as rare all things, howsoever laudable, if they have an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her own Eunuchs that stood by and heard her, were not affected to much as with any compulsion of her fortunes much less was her enemy daunted with her proud spirit. When Jehoi saw that she did use the little remainder of her life in seeking to vex him, he made her presently to understand her own estate, by deeds and not by words. He only called to her servants to know which of them would be on his side, and soon found them ready to offer their service before the very face of their proud Lady. Herupon he commanded them to cast her down head-long: which immediately they performed, without all regard of her greatness and estate, wherein she had a few hours before lived gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the judgments of God that had been denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her own servants, at the commandment of her greatest enemy, that was yesterday her subject, but now her Lord: and the perished miserably, struggling in vain with base groans, who contumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilst her insulting enemy fate on horse-back, adding indignity to her grief by scornful beholding the shameful manner of her fall, and trampling her body under foot. Her dead carcass that was left without the Walls, was devoured by dogs, and her very memory was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatry, murder, and oppression, with flow, but sure payment, and full interest.

Ahasia King of Juda fleeing a-pace from Jehoi, was overtaken by the way where he lurked: and receiving his deadly wound in the Kingdom of Samaritis, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all haste) and seek his burial in his own Kingdom: and this favour he obtained for his Grandfathers sake, not for his Fathers nor his own. He died at Megidda, and was thence carried to Jerusalem, where he was entred with his Ancestors, having reigned about one year.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia; and whose son he was that succeeded her.

SECT. I.

Of Athalia's usurping the Kingdom, and what pretences she might forge.

After the death of Ahasia, it is said that his house was not able to retain the Kingdom: which Note, and the proceedings of Athalia upon the death of her son, have given occasion to divers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Jos, who reigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispossessed of her son, under whose name she had ruled at her pleasure, did forthwith lay hold upon all the Princes of the blood, and flew them, that so she might occupy the Royal Throne her self, and reign as Queen, rather than live a Subject. She had before-hand put into great place, and made Counsellors unto her son, such as were fittest for her purpose, and ready at all times to execute her will: that she kept a strong guard about her, it is very likely; and as likely it is that the great execution done by Jehoram, upon the Princes, and many of the Nobility, had made the people tame, and fearful to fly, whatsoever they saw or heard.

Yet ambitious, how violent soever it be, is seldom or never so shameless as to refuse the commodity or goodly pretences offering themselves; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serve to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd far us to think, that Athalia, when she saw the Princes of the Royal blood, all of them in a manner, slain by her husband, and afterwards his own children destroyed by the Philistines, began even to play her own game, reducing by artificial practice, into fair likelihoods, those probabilities wherewith her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great truth of reason, either by her own mouth, or by some truly creature of hers might she give him to understand, how needful it were to take the best order whilst as yet he might, for fear of the worst that might happen. If the issue of David, which now remained only in his family, should by any accident fall (as woful experience had already shewed what might after come to pass) the people of Juda were not unlikely to choose a King of some new stock, a popular detestious man per adventure, one that to countenance his own unworthiness, would not care what aspersions he laid upon that Royal house, which was fallen down. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, foreseeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contrive the destruction of him, and all his feed? Wherefore it were the wisest way to design by his authority, not only his successor, but also the reversioner, and so to provide, that the Crown might never be subject to any rising, but remain in the disposition of them that loved him best, if the worst that might be feared coming to pass, his own posterity could not retain it.

Such persuasions being urged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that governed his affections, were able to make the jealous Tyrant think, that the only way to frustrate all devices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her heir, the last and youngest of his house, whom most concerned, as being the Queen Mother, to uphold the first and eldest.

If Athalia took no such course as this in her husbands time, yet might she do it in her sons. For Ahasia (besides that he was wholly ruled by his mother) was not like to take much care for the security of his half-brother,

SECT. II.

How Jehoi spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest Athalia.

In all this time Jehoi did never go about to disturb her; which in reason he was likely to desire, being an enemy to her whole House. But he was occupied at the first in establishing himself, rooting out the posterity of Ahab, and reforming something in Religion: afterwards in wars against the Ammonites, wherein he was so far overcharged, that hardly he could retain his own, much less attempt upon others. Of the line of Ahab there were seventy living in Samaritis, out of which number Jehoi by letter advised the Citizens to set up some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was; which they well understood to proceed from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they took example by the two Kings whom he had slain, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their service; wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in less than one days warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were enjoyed by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Basal by a subtilty, feigning a great sacrifice to their god, by which means he drew them all together into one Temple, where he slew them: and in the same zeal to God utterly demolished all the monuments of that impiety.

Concerning the Idolatry devised by Jeroboam, no King of Israel had ever greater reason than Jehoi to destroy it. For he needed not to fear lest the people should beallured to the house of David; it was (in appearance) quite rooted up, and the Crown of Juda in the possession of a cruel Tyranness: he had received his kingdom by the unexpected grace of God; and further in regard of his zeal expressed in destroying Basal out of Israel, he was promised notwithstanding his following the sin of Jeroboam, that the kingdom should remain in his Family to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serve; he would needs help to piece out Gods providence with his own circumference; so doing therein like a foolish greedy gamester, who by stealing a needless Card to assure himself of winning a stake, forfeits his whole bet. He had questionless displeased many, by that which he did against Basal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the use of superstition, so long practised as was that Idolatry of Jeroboam. Yet all these, how many soever they were, had never once thought upon making him King, if God, whom (to retain them) he now tormented, had not given him the Crown, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, that could at any time after be found in the means of holding it.

This ingratitude of Jehoi drew terrible vengeance of God upon Israel, wherewith Hazael King of Damascus was the executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous Prince we may find in the Prophecy of Elihu, who fore-told it, saying: Their Cities shall thou set on fire; and their young men shall thou lay with the sword, and shalt dash their Infants against the stones, and rend in pieces their women with child. So did not only the wickedness of Ahab cause the ruin of his whole house, but the obdurate Idolatry of the people bring a lamentable misery upon all the Land. For the fury of Hazael's victory was not quenched with the destruction of a few towns, nor wearied with one invasion; Q. 9 2 but but he smite them in all the east of Israel, and wasted all the Country beyond the River of Jordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities, it seems that the people repented not of their Idolatry (For in those days the Lord began to smite Israel:) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble house of Athalia, under which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had bravely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Bombadad to restore the Cities which his Father had won: whereas now they were fain to make woful shifts, living under a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his mother that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruel enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can find all manner of difficulties in serving him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in stead of the ease and the pleasure to themselves propounded by contrary courses, overwhelmed with the troubles which they sought to avoid: and therein by God, whom they first forsok, forsaken, and left unto the wretched labours of their own blind wilfulness, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

SECT. III.

Of Athaliah's Government.

THESE calamities falling upon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giving her leisure to look to things at home: as having little to do abroad, unless it were so that the held some correspondence with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her Husbands Grand-father King Asa, who had done the like. And some probability that she did so, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For we find, that this wicked Athalia and her children brake up the house of God, and all things that were dedicate to the house of God, did they bestow upon Baalim. Such a sacrilege, though it proceeded from a desire to set out her own Idolatry, with such pomp as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some fair pretext of necessity of the State so requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successeur was fain to do the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taste of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

Under this impious government of Athalia, the devotion of the Priests and Levites was very notable, and served (no doubt) very much to retain the people in the Religion taught by God himself, howsoever the Queens proceedings advanced the contrary. For the poverty of that sacred Tribe of Levi must needs have been exceeding great at this time, all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being utterly lost, the obligations and other perquisites, by which they lived, being now very few and small: and the store, laid up in better times under godly Kings, being all taken away by shameful robbery. Yet they up-held in all this misery the service of God, and the daily sacrifice, keeping daily their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no less than in those days wherein their entertainment was far better.

SECT. IV.

Of the preservation of Joas.

Jehoiada then occupied the high Priesthood, an honourable, wife, and religious man. To his carefulness it may be ascribed, that the state of the Church was in some slender sort up-held in those unhappy times. His Wife was Jeshabab, who was daughter of King Jehoram, and sister to Athalia, a godly Lady and virtuous, whose piety makes it seem that Athalia was not her Mother, though her access to the Court argues the contrary: but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her own Fathers house, than the education under such a Mother could have permitted her to be such as she was. By her care Joash the young Prince that reigned soon after, was conveyed out of the nursery, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings children, and was carried secretly into the Temple, where as secretly he was brought up. How it came to pass that this young child was not hunted out, when his body was missing: nor any great reckoning (for ought that we find) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was not good in policy, that the people should hear say, that one of the children had avoided that cruel blow: it might have made them hearken after innovations, and to be less conformable to their present government. So Joash was delivered out of that slaughter, and his nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peradventure to be cast away, as having no other guard than a poor Woman that gave him suck, who too lightly doubting that her self should have been slain, was fled away with him into some desolate place, where it was like enough that she and he should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, easily coin such tales, and rather swear them to be true in their own knowledge, than they will lose the thanks due to their joyful tidings.

SECT. V.

Whose Son Joas was.

Whether Joas may be thought likely to have been the Son of Ahaziah.

NOW concerning this Joash, whose son he was, it is a thing of much difficulty to affirm, and hath caused much controversy among Writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the son of Athalia, seem plain enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might give title of Son unto him, in regard that he was his Successor, I neither by my self can find, nor can by any help of Authors learn how to answer the difficulties appearing in the contrary opinions of them, that think him to have been, or not, the natural son of Athalia. For whereas it is said, that the house of Athalia was not able to retain the Kingdom: some do infer that this Joash was properly called his son, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as son in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the murder murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For the perceiving that the Kingdom was to fall into their hands, in whom the had no interest, might easily find cause to fear, that the Tyranny exercised by her Husband at her instigation upon so many noble Houses, would now be revenged upon her self. The ruin of her Idolatrous Religion might in this case terrify both her and her Minions: the sentence of the Law regarding that offence with death: and the Tragedy of Jeshabab teaching her what might happen to another Queen. All this had little concerned her if her own Grand-child had been heir to the Crown: for she that had power enough to make her self Queen, could with more ease, and less envy have taken upon her the office of a Protector, by which authority she might have done her pleasure, and been the more obeyed by others, and secure of her own Estate, as not wanting an Heir. Wherefore it was not needful, that she should be so unnatural, as to destroy the Child of her own Son, of whose life she might have made greater use than the cool of his death: whereas indeed, the love of Grand-mothers to their Nephews, is little less than the Mothers to their children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seem incredible, that all natural affection should be cast aside, when as neither necessity urgeth, nor any commodity thereby gotten requirerth it, yet when all humane policy doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would have perfwaded.

§. II.

That Joas did not descend from Nathan.

BUT (as it is more easy to find a difficulty in that which is related, than to show how it might have otherwise been) the pedigree of this Joash is, by them which think him not the son of Athalia, let down in such sort, that it may very justly be suspected. They say, that he descended from Nathan the son of David, and not from Solomon: to which purpose they bring a History (I know not whence) of two Families of the race of David, saying, that the line of Solomon held the Kingdom with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the Family of Nathan should succeed it. Concerning this Nathan the son of David, there are that would have him to be Nathan the Prophet, who, as they think, was by David adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also St. Augustine sometimes was, but afterward he revoked it, as was meet: for this Nathan is reckoned among the sons of David, by Isaias, the daughter of Amemar, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I find him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him Ersamus, and Abel Stapulensis, have likewise held the fame of Joash, deriving him from Nathan. But Nathan and those other brethren of Solomon by the same Mother, are thought, upon good likelihoods to have been the Children of Uriah the Hittite: and so are they accounted by sundry of the Fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulensis, who follow the Hebrew Expolitors of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Solomon calling himself the only begotten of his Mother, do approve this Exposition: For we read no more than two sons which Isaias or Isaias did bear unto David, whereof one begotten in Adultery, died an Infant, and Solomon only of her Children by the King did live. So that the rest must needs have been the Children of Uriah, and are thought to have been David's only by adoption. Wherefore if Joas had not been the son of Athalia, then must that pedigree have been false, wherein S. Matthew deriveth him lineally from

Solomon; yea, then had not our blessed Saviour issued from the loins of David, according to the flesh, but had only been of his line by courtesy of the Nation, and form of Law, as any other might have been. As for the authority of Philis, which hath drawn many late Writers into the opinion that Joash was not of the posterity of Solomon, it is enough to say, that this was Frian Annus his Philis: For no other Edition of Philis, hath any such matter; but Annus can make Authors to speak what he list.

§. III.

That Joas may probably be thought to have been the son of Jehoram.

IN so doubtful a case, if it seem lawful to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought upon, methinks it were not amiss to open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickedness of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat King of Juda, for which he and his Children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods Mercies towards the house of David, that according to his promise he would give him a Light, and to his Children for ever: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same Jehoram, there was not a son left him, save Jehoshaphat the youngest of his Sons. Now if it were in regard of Gods promise to David, that after those sacrifices of Jehoram upon all his Brethren, and of the Philistines and Arabians upon the children of Jehoram, one of the seed of David escaped; why may it not be thought that he was fain to have escaped, in whom the line of David was preserved? For had all the race of Solomon been rooted up in these woful Tragedies, and the progeny of Nathan succeeded in place thereof, like enough it is that some remembrance more particular would have been extant, of an event so memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, is indeed apparent by the Genealogy of our Lord, as it is recounted by St. Luke: But the preservation of the House of David, mentioned in the Book of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Jehoshaphat, in whom the Royal branch of Solomon, the natural, and not only legal issue remaining of David was kept alive. Wherefore it may be thought that this Joash, who followed Athalia in the Kingdom, was the youngest son of Jehoram, whose life Athalia, as a Step-dame, was not likely to pursue. For it were not easily understood, why the preservation of David's line, by Gods especial Mercy, in regard of his Promise made, should pertain rather to that time, when besides Athalia herself, there were two and forty of his Brethren, or (as in another place they are called) sons of his Brethren remaining alive, which afterwards were all slain by Jehoi; than have reference to the lamentable destruction, and little less than extirpation of that Progeny, wherein one only did escape. Certainly that inhumane Murder which Jehoram committed upon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the History) revenged upon his own children: then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistines and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards prosecuted by Jehoi, and finally took effect by the hands of that same wicked Woman, at whose instigation he had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heavy judgment laid upon Jehoram and all his children, only Jehoshaphat his youngest son was exempted: whom therefore I should affirm to be the same with Joas, which is called the son of Athalia, I should should not want good probability. Some further appearance of necessity there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwife have been. For it was the youngest son of Jehoram, in whom the race was preferred; which could not in any likelihood be Ahaziah, seeing that he was twenty years old at the least (as is already noted) when he began to reign, and consequently, was born in the eighteenth or twentieth year of his Fathers age. Now I know not whether of the two is more unlikely, either that Jehoram should have begotten many Children before he was eighteen years of age, or that he (as he had) many Wives and Children, he should have had a son at the eighteenth year of his age, and yet have been more than thirty years following; each of which muſt had been true, if this were true that Ahaziah was the fame Jehoshaphat which was his youngest son. But this inconvenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the causticks cruelty of Athalia, in seeking the life of Josiah are easily cleared, if Josiah and Jehoshaphat were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion; For he was seven years old when he began to reign; which if we understood of years complete, he might have been years old at the death of Jehoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sickness. Neither is it necessary to say that he was the natural son of Jehoram, though he be the son of Ahaziah, than it were to say, as great Authors have done, that it is difficult notwithstanding, that he was of the Posterity of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer, which, had it concurred with the rest, might have served as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Jehoshaphat, that foundeth much more near to Josiah, than to Ahaziah, in an English ear, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilful in that language) against the diversity of certain Letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our Western manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, Ahaziah, if it be that Ahaziah himself be also Josiah, and Ahaziah and Jehoshaphat; in which manner Josiah might also have been, I know not how to answer. I find no other warrant hereof than this, because I will not presume to build an opinion upon the weakness of foundation of mine own conjecture, but leave all to the consideration of such as have more ability to judge, and leisure to consider of this point,

§. IV.

Upon what reasons Athalia might seek to destroy Joas, if he were her own Grand-child.

If therefore we shall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the Text according to the Letter, we may say, that Abigail was not only blinded by the passion of Ambition and Zeal to her Idolatrous worship of Baal, and thus sacrificed the accomplishment of some unnatural desires, in seeking the destruction of her Grand-child, and the death of the Blood-Royal. For whether it were so that Abigail (as proud and cruel Wome are not always chaste) had imitated the liberty of Jezabel her Sister in Law, whose Whoredoms were upbraided by John to her son; or whether the had Children by some former Husband, before she was married unto Jehoram (which is not unlikely, in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and Sister to Abab) certain it is that she had Sons of her own, and those old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondered at, that to settle the Crown upon her own Children, the did seek to cut off, by wicked policy, other children. As for Jos, if he were his Grand-mother's, yet she might mistrust the interest which his Mother had in him, left when he came to years, it might draw him from her devotion. And hercof (belides that Women do commonly better love their Daughters Husbands, than their Sons Wives) there is some appearance in the reign of her Son: for he made him spend all his time in idle journeys, to no other apparent end, than that he might rule at home; and he living abroad is estranged from his Wife, and entertain some new fancy, wherein Jezebel had cunning enough to be his Tutor. But when the sword of Yehu had rudely cut in sundry all these devices, then was Abihai fain to go roundly to work, and do as the did, whereby the thought to make all his leaving, if (as I could rather think) the were only Struck, if not dead, we need not seek into the reasons moving Jos to take away his life: her own hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the fire.

SECT. VI.

A digression, wherein is maintained the liberty of using conjecture in Histories.

THus much concerning the Person of Jehs, from whom, as from a new root, the Tree of David was propagated into many Branches. In handling of which Matter, the Jews consider the nature of this History, and the diversity between it and others, the less me-thinks I need to suspect mine own presumption, as deferring blame, for curiosity in matter of doubt, or boldness in liberty of conjecture. For all Histories do give us information of humane counsels and events, as far forth as the knowledge and faith of the Writers can afford ; but of Gods Will, by which all things are ordered, they speak only as women, and many times fallily. This we often find in prophane Writers, who ascribe the ill success of great undertakings, to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the less wonder, if we consider the answer made by the Jews in Egypt unto Jehemy the Prophet, reprehending their Idolatry. For howsoever the written Law of God was known unto the People, and his punishments laid upon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and even then but newly executed ; yet were they so obstinately bent unto their Wills, that they would not by any means be drawn to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction, but they told the Prophet roundly, that they worshipped the Queen of Heaven, as they and their Fathers, their Kings and their Princes had used to do. For then (said they) bad we plenty of Vi-³⁰ 30-40
tuals, and were rich, and felt no evil: Adding, that 17. 18.
all manner of miseries were befallen them, since they left off that service of the Queen of Heaven. So blind is the wisdom of Man, in looking into the Counsell of God, which to find out, there is no better nor o-ver guide than his own written will. Not perverted by vain additions.

But this History of the Kings of Israel and Juda hath herein a singular prerogative above all that have been written by the most sufficient of merely humane Authors: it setteth down expressly the true, and first causes that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his over-browardness in Battel; the ruine of his Family, to the security of Jezebel, in in Jerusal: not the Victories of Hirad, to the great commotions raised in Ispad by the coming of Jehus: but referring all unto the Will of God, I mean, to his revealed Will, from which that his hidden purposes do not vary, this Story, by many great examples, gives most notable proof. True it is, that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these Books nothing largely described: nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir Philip Sidney, that Historians do borrow of Poets, not only much of their Ornament, but somewhat of their fableance. Informations are often false, Records not always true, and notorious Actions commonly insufficient to discover the Passions which do let their heart on foot. Wherefore they are fain (I speak of the best, and in that which is allowed for to take out of Livy every one circumstance of Claudius his Journey against Alibabam in Italy, fitting all to another Endicits, or any Practice of that kind, is not the Historical, nor Poetical) to search into the popular humour of Princes and of those which have governed their Affections and Influences, by which they wrought; from whence they do collect the most likely motives or impediments of every bunleins; and to figuring a near to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they judiciously conceal the defects in country, or obliquity in proceeding.

affluence, howsoever it may give Satisfaction. For the heart of Man is unsearchable: and Princes, howsoever their intents be seldom hidden from some of those many eyes which pry both into them, and into such as live about them; yet sometimes either by their own cold temper, by some subtil misfs, they conceal the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lie dead, and buried in oblivion, when the preparations which they begar, are converted to another use. The industry of an Historian, having for many things to weary it, may well be excused, when finding apparent caufe enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions work to the same end, that one final matter in a weak mind is more effectual, than many that seem far greater. So comes it many times to pass, that great cities, which consume whole Hordes or Towns, begin with a few fraws, that are waisted or not seen: when the flame is discovered, having falten upon some Wood-pile, that stretcheth all about it. Queli-onk is it is, that the Wars commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greeks, proceeded from the desire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: Howsoever the enterprise of the Athenians upon Sardes, was noised abroad as the Ground of that Quarrel; yet Herodotus telleth us, that the wanton desire of the Queen Atossa, to have the Grecian daughters her Bond-women, did first move Darius to prepare for this War before he had received any injury, and when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enjoy what was already gotten.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodias be more justly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for alledging the vain appetite, and secret speech of the Queen in Bed with her Husband, as the cause of those great evils following; this I may boldly affirm (having, I think, in every estate some sufficient witness) that matters of much consequence founded in all seeming upon substantial reasons, have issued indeed from such petty trifles, as no Historians would either think upon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope, made to a certain Friar, coming to visit him in his Popedom, as having long before in his meaner estate, been his familiar Friar. This pope Friar, being emboldened by the Pope to use his old liberty of speech, adventured to tell him, that he very much wondered how it was possible for his Holiness, whom heretaker took for a direct honest Man, than any cunning Polititian, to attain unto the Papacy ; in compassing of which, all the subtilty (said he) of the most crafty brains, find work enough : and therefore the more I think upon the Art of the Conclave, and your unaptness thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plain dealing Friar, dealt with him again as plainly, saying : Hadst thou lived abroad as I have done, and seen by what folly this World is Governed, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred unto those exorbitant Engines, by which the course of affairs is moved, the Pope said true. For the wildest of Men are not without their Vanities, which requiring and finding mutual Toleration, work more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needs or can. But if we lift up our thoughts to that Supreme Governour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Jupiter.

Qui terram inertem, qui mare temperat
Ventosum, & urbes, regnaque tristia, Divosque mortalesque turmas,
Imperio regit unus æquo.

Who rules the duller Earth, the Wind swollen streams.

The civil Cities, and th'infernal Realms,
Who th'Host of Heaven, and the mortal Band, Alone doth Govern by his just Command.

Then shall we find the quite contrary. In him there is no uncertainty nor change, he foretenth all things, and all things dispoſeth to his own Honour & He neither deceiveth nor can be deceived: but continuing one and the ſame for ever, doth conſtantly Govern all Creatures by that Law, which He hath preſcribed, and will never alter. The vanities of Men beguile their vain contrivers, and the proſperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their deſtruction: yea, this broad and head-long paſſage to Hell, is not ſo delightful as it ſeems at the firſt entrance, but hath growing in it, beſides the poſſons which infect the ſoul, many cruel thorns deeply wounding the Body; all which if any few elude, they have only this miſerable advantage of others, that their deſcent was the more ſwift and expedit. But the Service of God is the Path guiding us to perfect happineſs, and hath in it a true, though not complete felicity, yea, ſuch a full abundance of all good things, as ſufficiently doth eaſily overcome all afflictions whatſoever: though unſubtle people blemiſhes that ſometimes tears the ſkinn of ſuch as walk in this bleſſed Way, do commonly lay hold upon them at ſuch time as they fit down to take their eaſe, and make them wiſh themselves at their journeyes end, in the preſence of their Lord whom they faithfully ſerve, in whole perfection is the fulſet of joy, and at whoſe right Hand are pleaſures for ever.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such Wisdom as may guide our desires and actions, we should not marvel though the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda and Israel, being written by Men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct us chiefly, in that which is most requisite for us to know: as the means to attain unto true felicity, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of Wisdom. Had the expectation of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) been written by some Prophet after the captivity: we may well believe that the Council of God therein, and the Executioners of his righteous Will, should have occupied either the whole or the principal room in that Narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, and the business at Sardis, with other occurrences, been the less true, though they might have been omitted, as the less material: But these things it had been lawful for any Man to gather out of prophane Histories, or out of Circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not have done injury to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forbore to derogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the business that I have now in hand: wherein I cannot believe that any Man of judgment will tax me, as either fabulous or presumptuous. For he doth not feign, that rehearsef probabilities as bare conjectures; neither doth he deprave the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things which Authority alone, without further Circumstance, ought to have confirmed in every Mans belief. And this may suffice in defence of the liberty which I have used in conjectures, and may hereafter use when occasion shall require, as neither unlawful, nor mis-becoming an Historian.

SECT. VII.

The conspiracy against Athalia.

When Athalia had now six years and longer worn the Crown of Juda, and had found no external Enemy, nor domestic Adversary, to disturb her possession, suddenly the period of her Glory, and reward of her wickedness meeting together, took her away without any warning, by a violent and shameful death. For the growth of the young Prince began to be such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had been very unfitting that his Education should be simple, to him seem the Child of some poor Man (as for his safety it was requisite) when his Capacity required to have been induced with the stomach and qualities meet for a King. All this Jehoiada the Priest considered, and withal, the great increase of Impiety, which taking deep root in the Court, was likely to spread it self over all the Country, if care were not used to weed it up very speedily. Wherefore he associated unto himself five of the Captains, in whose fidelity he had best assurances, and having taken an oath of them, and slewed them the Kings son, he made a Covenant with them, to advance him to the Kingdom. These drew in others of the principal Men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first only that they should repair to Jerusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole Matter. There needed not many persuasions to win them to the business: The promise of the Lord unto the House of David, was enough to assure them that the action was both lawful, and likely to succeed as they desired.

But in compassing their intent, some difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issues: neither were the Captains, and other Associates of Jehoiada able by close working, to draw together to many truly and serviceable hands as would suffice to manage the business. To help in this case, the Priest gave order to such of the Levites that had finished their courses waiting on the Divine Service at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that succeeded in their turns, that they should not depart until they knew his further displeasure. So by admitting the new comers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noise, made up such a number, as would be able to deal with the Queens ordinary Guard, and that was enough: for if the Tyranness did not prevail against them at the first brunt, the favour of the People was like to shew it self on their side, who made head against her. These Levites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captains, and other Adherents, were bestowed in the outer Courts: As for Weapons, the Temple it self had store enough; King David had left an Armoury to the place, which was now employed in defence of his issue.

All things being in readines, and the day come, wherein this high design was to be put in execution, Jehoiada delivered unto the Captains, Armour for them and their adherents, appointed a Guard unto the Kings person, produced him openly, and gave unto him the Crown; using all ceremonies accustomed in such Solemnities, with great applause of the People. Of these doings, the Queen was the last that heard any word. Which is not so strange as it may seem: for insolent natures, by dealing outrageously with such as bring them ill-tidings, do commonly lose the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilst yet it may be prevented, and have no information of danger, till their own eyes, amazed with the suddenness, behold it in the shape of inevitable mischief.

All Jerusalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the news, others ran forth to see, and the common joy was so great, that without apprehension of peril, under the windows of the Court, were the People running and praising the King. Athalia hearing and being, holding the extraordinary concourse, and noise of the folks in the streets, making towards the Temple, with much unusual passion in their looks, did presently conceive, that somewhat worthy of her care was happening; though what it might be, she did not apprehend. Howsoever it were, the meant to use her own wisdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may be, that the thought it some especial solemnity used in the Divine Service, which caused this much ado; and hereof the unaccustomed number of Levites, and of other devout Men, about the Town, might give some presumption.

Many things argue that the little thought upon her own Tragedy; although Josaphat would make it seem otherwise. For we find in the Text, She came to the People in the House of the Lord, (which was near to her Palace) and that when she looked and saw the King stand by his Pillar, as the manner was with the Prince, or Great Men of the Land by him, and the Trumpeters proclaiming him; she rent her cloths, and cried Treason, Treason. Hereby it appears that she was quietly going, without any mistrust or fear, to take her place; which when she found occupied by another, then she began to afflict her self, as one cast away, and cried out in vain upon the Treason, whereby she saw that she must perish. But that she came with a Guard of armed Men to the Temple, (as Josaphat reporteth) and that her company being beaten back, she entered alone, and commanded the people to kill the young Tyrant, I find no where in Scripture, neither do I hold it credible. For had she truly known how things went, she should fairly have gathered her friends about her, and used those forces in defence of her Crown, by which she got it, and thence had held it. Certainly, if it were granted, that she, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troop yet it had been meer madness in her, to enter the place alone, when her assistants were kept out; but if this, perceiving that neither her authority, nor their own weapons, could prevail to let in her guard, would nevertheless take upon her to command the death of the new King, calling a child of seven years old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom the law to be armed in his defence, may we not think that she was mad in the most extreme degree? Certain it is that the council of God would have taken effect, in her destruction, had she used the most likely means to discomfit it: yet we need not so fit her throat with any moral impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeal of Jehoiada found more efficacious, through her infidelity, than his otherwise could have been expected: so that at his appointment, she was without more ado, carried out of the Temple and slain, yet so, that no blood, save her own, was shed in that quarrel; for his small train that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

Josaphat

SECT. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a comparison of her and Jezabel.

Much like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashness of her Nephew Jehoram the Israhelite, who did foolishly call himself into the very throat of danger, gaping upon him, into his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet the her self, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived such a life as Jezabel had done, was rewarded with a suitable death. These two Queens were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughters, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her Husband; was an Idolatress and a Murderess. The only difference appearing in their condition, is, that Jezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them surviving her Husband about eight years, did spend their time in satisfying her own affections; the one using tyranny, as the exercise of her haughty mind; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her unchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference was, or in those things which may seem in this world to pertain unto the dead when they are gone.

Each of them was taken on the sudden by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming upon the Treason, received sentence from the mouth of one that had lived under her subjection; in execution whereof, Jezabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia slain at her own horse-gate; the death of Athalia having (though not much) the more leisure to vex her proud heart; that of Jezabel the more indignity, and shame of body. Touching their burial, Jezabel was devoured by Dogs, as the Lord had threatened by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia we do not find. Like enough it is that she was buried, as having not persecuted and slain the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her burial there is no monument, for she was a Church-robbet. The service of Baal erected by these two Queens, was destroyed as soon as they were gone, and their Chaplains, the Priests of that Religion, slain. Herein alio it came to pass, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; both of them by the same hand of Hazeel the Syrian, in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seems to have been her good friend) pretended her revenge, as any part of his quarrel to Juda. Concerning children, all belonging to Jezabel perished in few days after her: whether Athalia left any behind her, it is uncertain; she had sons living after she was Queen, of whom, or of any other, that they were slain with her, we do not find.

This is a matter not unworthy of consideration, in regard of much that may depend upon it. For if the children of Athalia had been in Jerusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely have followed her as necessarily, and been required, as well as the death of Matan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbade that the children should die for the fathers, Deut. 17. 16. could not have saved these ungracious Imps, whom the clause following would have cut off, which commands, that every Man should die for his own sin. Seeing therefore that they had been professors and advocates of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yet had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoil of it; likewise it is, that they should not have cleaved with life, if Jehoiada the Priest could have gotten them into his hands. As there was lawful cause enough requiring their death, so the severity of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craved as much, and that very earnestly. For there had been esteemed as heirs of their mothers Crown, and being reckoned as her assistants in that particular business of robbing the Temple, may be thought to have carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes, and fellows with their Mother in the Kingdom. Therefore it is evident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazeel in his Wars against Jehoi) absent from Jerusalem; whereby Jehoiada might, with the more providence, adventure to take Arms against their Mother, that was desolate.

Of Joas and Amasia, with their Contemporaries; where somewhat of the building of Carthage.

S E C T. I.

Of Joas his doings, whilst Jehoiaha the Priest lived.

BY the death of Athalia, the whole Country of Juda was filled with great joy and quietness; wherein Joas, a child of seven years old, or there-about, began his reign, which continued almost forty years. During his minority, he lived under the protection of that honourable man Jehoiaha the Priest, who did as faithfully govern the Kingdom, as he had before carefully preserved the Kings life, and restored him unto the Throne of his ancestors. When he came to mans estate, he took by appointment of Jehoiaha two Wives, and begat Sons and Daughters, repairing the Family of David which was almost worn out. The first Act that he took in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needful piece of work, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, through the wickedness of ungodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should uphold the Temple, whom the Temple had upheld. This business he followed with so earnest a zeal, that not only the Levites were more slack than he, but even Jehoiaha was fain to be quickened by his administration. Money was gathered for the charges of the work; partly out of the tax imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberality of the people; who gave so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and silver; and with all other utensils. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as under godly Kings they had been, and the service of God was magnificently celebrated.

S E C T. II.

The Death of Jehoiaha, and Apostasy of Joas.

BUT this endured no longer than the life of Jehoiaha the Priest; who having lived an hundred and thirty years, died before his Country could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Juda, as he well deserved, having preserved the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little of rooting up themselves, and all their issue. Yet this honourable Funeral seems to have been given to him, at the motion of the people; it being said, They buried him in the City of David. As for the King himself, who did owe to him no less than his Crown and life, he is not likely to have been Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby been discharged of some heavy debt.

For after the death of Jehoiaha, when the Princes of Juda began to flatter their King, he soon forgot, not only the benefits received by this worthy man his old Counsellor, but also the good precepts which he had received from him, yea and God himself, the Author of all good gifts. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, whereby Josabab and Amasia had so infected the Country, in fifteen or sixteen Years, that thirty Years, or thereabout, of the reign of Joas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to clear it from that mischief. The King himself, when once he was entred into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his liberty, to despise the service of God; and a manifest proof of his being now King indeed, that he regarded no longer the frow admonitions of devout Priests. Hereby it appears, that his former zeal was only counterfeited, wherein like an Actor upon the stage, he had striven to express much more lively affection, than they could shew, that were indeed religious.

S E C T. III.

The causes and times of the Syrians invading Juda in the days of Joas.

BUT God, from whom he was broken loose, gave him over into the hands of men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Town of the Philistines, addressed himself towards Jerusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich booty, did invite him. He had an Army hearted by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the war (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough, that the Kings of Juda had assisted the Israelites, in their enterprises upon Aram, at Rasnah Gilead. Yet I think he did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdom of Juda had molested the Aramites in the time of his predecessor, this was throughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, and leaving the ten Tribes in their extreme misery, to the fury of Hazael himself. Nether is it likely, that Hazael should have gone about to awake a sleeping Dog, and stir up against himself a powerful enemy, before he had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay between Jerusalem and his own Kingdom, if some opportunity had not performed such ease and good success as might rather advance, than any way disturb his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sons of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countries usually do) to draw many partakers of their own to his side; and not to remain, as Joas did, a neutral in the war between him and Israel, but to join all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Jehoi his posterity, who like a bloody Traitor, had utterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queens, their mother, even the whole house of Abah, to which he was a subject. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparent reason to invade the Kingdom of Juda. Howsoever we find, that Joas was afraid of him, and therefore took all the lawful things, and all the gold that was found in the treasure of the house of the Lord, in his own house, with which present he redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionless) thinking it a better bargain, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the assurance of this for the possibility of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich booty of unhappy treasure, which belonging to the living God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the grave. For in the thirty-seventh year of Joas, which was the fifteenth of Jehoiaha, he made this purchase; but in the time or very next year he died, leaving all that he had unto his son Behadad, with whom these treasures prospered no otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazael, is, by some, confounded with that war of the Aramites upon Juda, mentioned in the second book of Chronicles. But the reasons alleged by them that hold the contrary opinion, do forcibly prove, that it was not all one war. For the former was compounded without blood-shed or fight; in the latter, Joas tried the fortune of a battle, wherein being put to the worst, he lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life. In the one Hazael himself was present; in the other, he was not named: but contrariwise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seem to have been the son of Hazael) is said to have been at Damascus. The first Army came to conquer, and was so great, that it cried the King of Juda; The second was a small company of men, which did animate Joas (in vain, for God was against him) to deal with them, achieving a very great Army.

Now, concerning the time of this former invasion, I cannot perceive that God forsook him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who think that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Jehoiaha the Priest, because that story is joyed to the resurrection of the Temple. This had been probable, if the death of Jehoiaha had been afterwards mentioned in that place; the second book of Kings; or if the Apostasy of Joas, or that of other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his own will and pleasure; neither was he more unjoint in the afflictions of Job that righteous man, or the death of Jesus that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid upon Pharaoh, or his judgement upon the house of Abah. But it appears plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent service of God therewithal, which are joyed together, were used in the house of the Lord continually all the days of Jehoiaha; soon after whose death, if not immediately upon it, that is, (as some very learnedly collect) in the sixth, or thirty seventh year of this Joas his reign, the King falling away from the God of his Fathers, became a foul Idolater.

And indeed we commonly observe, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay upon his servants without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, have always tended unto the bettering of their good. In which respect, even the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the sight of the Lord) were to their great advantage. But with evil and rebellious men, God keepeth a more even and strict account; punishing them with their faults to get the start of their punishment; and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amerites) till their wickedness be full; or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to run on in their wicked courses, to their greater misery. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appears that he dealt with Joas. For this unhappy man, did not only continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetful of God and all goodness, as if he had thoven to exceed the wickedness of all that went before him, and to leave such a villanous pattern unto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should endure to imitate.

S E C T. IV.

How Zacharia was murdered by Joas.

SUNDRY Prophets having laboured in vain to reclaim the people from their superstition, Zacharia the son of Jehoiaha the Priest, was stirred up at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickedness, and make them understand the punishment due unto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so much honoured, and son to a man so exceedingly beloved in his life time, and revered, that if Joas had repented him (as Abah did Eliaz) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honesty to have cloaked his ill affection, and have used at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had born unto the King, and the unaccountable benefits which they had done unto him, from his first infancy, were such, as should have placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured love of Joas, yea though he had been otherwise a man of very small mark, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should be heard with reverence, how simple soever he appears that brings it. But this King Joas, having already formed the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deal with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandmen, in the parable of our Saviour, dealt with the heir of Yerabeam; who said, This is the heir, come let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing blithe that he was no free Prince, as long as one durst tell him the plain truth, how great soever that mans deservings were, that did so, yea though Gods commandment required it. So they conspired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any form of open Law, as was practised upon Naboth; or whether furnishing him by any close treachery, I do neither read, nor can conjecture. The dignity of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracy, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into public judgment, though that the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, and by order of Law, inflicted upon malefactors, may argue the contrary. Most likely it is, that the Kings commandment, by which he suffered, took place in stead of Law; which exercise of meer power (as hath been already noted) was nothing strange amongst the Kings of Juda.

S E C T. V.

How Joas was shamefully beaten by the Amorites, and of his death.

THIS odious murder, committed by an unthankful (make upon the man in whose bosom he had been fostered, as of it self alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hateful to men of his own time, and his memory detested in all ages; so had it the well described curle of the blessed Martyr, to accompany it unto the Throned of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell down swiftly, and heavily upon the head of that infamous monster. It was the last year of his reign; the end of his time coming then upon him, when he thought himself beginning to live, how he lived without controulment. When that year was expired the Aramites came into the Country, rather as may seem to get pillage, than to perform any great action; for they came with a small company of men: but God had intended to do more by them, than they themselves did hope for.

That Joas naturally was a coward, his bloody malice against his best friends, is, in my judgment, proof sufficient: though otherwise his bold composition with Hazael, when he might have leved (as his son after him did mutter) three hundred thousand chosen men for the war, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when he might have his own will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of Rovers, he took a very great Army, for that wife men might well perceive, that he knew what he did, making thow as it he would fight for his Country, and expose himself to danger of war, whereas indeed all was mere ostentation and no peril to be feared: he going forth so strongly appointed, against so weak enemies. Thus might wise men think, and laugh at him in secret, considering what ado he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisdom of this world is foolishness, did laugh not only at this vain-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and King Joas met, whether it were by some folly of the Leaders or by some amazement happening among the fouldiers, or by whatsoever means it pleased God to work, so it was, that that great Army of Juda received a notable overthrow, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Juda, at whose persuasion the King had become a Rebel to the King of Kings. As for Joas himself (as Abimelech and others expound the story) he was forely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they think) taken and shamefully tormented, to bring out of him an excessive ransom.

And surely, all circumstances do greatly strengthen this conjecture: for the Text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised upon Joas ignominious judgments; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-favourably. Now at that time Joas the son of Jehozabab reigned over Israel and Rehoboam the son of Hizabab over the Syrins, in Damascus: the one a valiant undertaking Prince, raised up by God to restore the State of his miserable Country, the other inferior every way to his father, of whose purchases he lost a great part, for want of skill to keep it. The difference in condition found between these two Princes, promising no other event than such as afterward followed, might have given to the King of Juda good cause to be bold, and pluck up his spirits, which Hazael had beaten down, if God had not been against him. But his fearful heart being likely to quake upon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with some flow of war at his doors, it werc casie to make him crave any tolerable conditions of peace. The unexpected good success hereof, already related, and the (perhaps as unsuspected) ill success, which the A- ramites found in their following was against the King of Israel, sheweth plainly the weakness of all earthly might, refuting the power of the Almighty. For by his Ordinance, both the Kingdom of Juda, after more than forty Years time of gathering strength, was unable to drive out a small company of Enemies; and the Kingdom of Israel, having so been trodden down by Hazael, that only thirty Horsemen, ten Chariots, and ten thousand footmen were left; prevailed against his Son, and recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are every-where found, and therefore I will not insist upon this; though indeed we should not, if we be Gods children, think it more tedious to hear long and frequent reports of our heavenly Fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore-fathers upon earth.

When the Aramites had what they liked, and saw that they were not able, being so few, to take any possession of the Country, they departed out of Juda laden with spoil, which they sent to Damascus, themselves being like falling upon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not half so well. The King of Juda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sons of an Ammonite, and of a Mobabite, whom some (because only their Mothers names, being strangers, are expressed) think to have been bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or fear, lest (as Tyrants use) he should revenge himself upon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoever else it were that animated them to murder their King, the Scripture tells us plainly, that, For the blood of the children of Jehozabab, this befell him. And the time appears to have been used as the pretence of their conspiracy, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amasias, the son and successor of Joas, durst not punish them, till his Kingdom was established: but contrariwise his body was judged unworthy of burial in the Sepulchres of the Kings: whereby it appears, that the death of Zacharias caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recomended by his son, upon the Traytors, which well deserved death.

SECT. VI.

Of the Princes living in the time of Joas: of the time when Carthage was built: and of Dido.

There lived with Joas, Mozabab, and Diogenes in Athens: Endemus and Arifomander in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Syllius, and after him Syllius Alaudius, were Kings of the Alban in Italy. Orosius, commonly called Anaxandrus, the thirty seventh King, succeeded unto Ophrasius, began his reign over the Affrians, about the eighteenth year of Joas, which lasted forty two years. In the sixteenth of Joas, Cephrenus, the fourth from Sesias, succeeded unto Chopri in the Kingdom of Egypt, and held it fifty years.

In this time of Joas, was likewise the reign of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of Carthage by Dido, the building of which City is, by divers Authors, placed in divers ages, some reporting it to be 70 years younger than Rome, others above 400 Years older, few or none of them giving any reason of their assertions, but leaving us uncertain whom to follow:

Joephus,

Joeph.

Joephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre, counting one hundred forty and three years and eight months from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth year of Hyam King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seventh of Pigmalion. The particulars of this account (which is not rare in Joephus) are very perplexed, and serve not very well to make clear the total sum. But whether it were so that Joephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write some number of the years, which he reckoned in Fractions, as they were divided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hyam to Pigmalion, we may well enough believe, that the Tyrian writers, out of whole Books he gives us the whole sum, had good means to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, between two works no longer following one the other than the memory of three or four Generations might easily reach. This hundred forty and four years current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleventh year of Joas, was an hundred forty and three years before the birth of Rome, and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: A time so long after the death of Aeneas, that we might truly conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Anthonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram:

Ille ego sum Dido vultus quam conspicis hostes, Affimulata modis pulchraque mirificis.
Talis erat, sed non Maro quam mihi finxit erat mens.
Vix me inestis lata cupidinibus:
(Namque me Aeneas vidit me Troius anquam, Nec Lybiam adventi, classibus Illici.
Sed furias fugiones, atque arma prociacis laræ,
Servatis, fatore, morte pudicitiam Pellere transfixo castris quod petulatis enses:)
Non furor, aut Lese erudit amore dolor.
Sic occidisse jurat: Vixi sine vulnere fame,
Ultis virum, postis manibus oppeti.
Invida car in me stimulasti Musa Maronem, Fingent in nostra damna pudicitia?
Vos magis Historic lectores credite de me
Quam qui furta Deum consuevitque canant, Falsidice vates: Tenentur qui crimine verum, Hominis que deos affimulant vitis.

Which in effect is this:

I Am that Dido which thou here dost see,
Cunningly fram'd in beauteous Image,
Like this I was, but had not such a foul,
As Maro feign'd, in cecitious and foul.
Aeneas never with his Trojan Host Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
But flying proud Larbas villany,
Not mov'd by furious love or jealousy,
I did with weapon chaste, to save my fame,
Make way for death unclimely, ere it came.
This was my end; but first I built a Town,
Revenge'd my Husbands death, liv'd with renown.
Why didst thou stir up Virgil, envious Muse,
Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
Readers, believe Historians; not thofe.
Who to the World Joves thefts and vice expose.
Poets are Liars, and for Verses sake,
Will make the Gods of humane Crimes partake.

From the time of Dido unto the first Punic War, that Carthage grew and flourish'd in Wealth and Conquests, we find in many Histories: But in particular we find little of the Carthaginians affairs before that War, excepting those few things that are Recorded of their attempts of the life of Sicily. We will therefore defer the Relation of Matters concerning that mighty City, until such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed and prosecuted in the mean while the History that is now in hand.

SECT. VII.

The beginning of Amasia his reign: Of Joas King of Israel, and Elihai the Prophet.

Amasia, the son of Joash, being twenty five years old when his Father died, took possession of the Kingdom of Juda, wherein he laboured to demean himself, as his new beginning reign might be least offensive. The Law of Moses he professed to observe; which howsoever it had been fiercely despised since the time of Jehoram, by many great Persons of the Land, yet had it by provision of good Princes, yea, and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deep root in the Peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conform himself unto it. And at that present time, the slaughter which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late King from the Service of God, being seconded by the death of the King himself, even whilst that execrable Murder, committed by the King upon Zacharias, was yet fresh in Memory, did serve as a notable example of Gods Justice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the People in holding the Religion of their Fathers, and to discourage Amasia from following the way, which led to such an evil end. He therefore, having learned of his Father the art of Diffimulation, did not only forbear to punish the Traytors that had slain King Joas, but gave way to the time, and suffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Jehoram formerly had been in the City of David, yet not among the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda. Nevertheless, after this, when (belike) the noise of the People having wearied it felt into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deed done, was applauded as the handy-work of God) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but retired secure, as having done well, seeing it was not ill taken: The King, who perceived his Government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heat of Mens affections being well allayed, it was casie to distinguish between their Treasons and Gods Judgments, which by their Treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their Children (as the Law did require) were suffered to live: which could not but give contentment to the People, seeing that their King did the office of a just Prince, rather than of a revenging son. This being done, and his own life better secured by such exemplary Justice, against the like attempts, Amasia carried himself outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelve or thirteen years.

As Amasia gathered strength in Juda by the commodity of a long peace, so Joas the Israhel grew as fast in power, by following the war hotly against the Aramites.

Aramiter. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had been, worshipping the Calves of Jerobam. For this sin had God plighted the house of Jehu, that the ten Tribes wanted little of being utterly consumed, by Elisba and Benadab, in the time of Jehoram and his son Jehozabab. But as Gods benefits to Jehu, sufficed not to withdraw him from this political Idolatry, so were the mitres, rewarding that iniquity, unable to reclaim Jehozabab from the same impious cause: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, did condescend unto the prayers of this ungodly Prince, even then when he and his miserable Subjects, were obdurate in following their own abominable ways. Therefore in temporal matters the ten Tribes recovered space; but the favour of God which had been infinitely more worth, I do not find, nor believe that they fought: that they had it not, I find in the words of the Prophet, saying plainly to Amaziah, The Lord is not with Israel, neither with the house of Ephraim.

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisba, who lived in those times, did foretell the prosperity of the Israelites under the reign of Josiah or whether Jehozabab, wearied and broken with long adversity, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himself in part of the heavy cares attending those unhappy Syrian Wars, by laying the burden upon his hopeful son: we find that in the thirty seventh year of Josiah, King of Juda, Josiah the son of Jehozabab began to reign over Israel in Samaria; which was in the 15th year of his Fathers reign, and some two or three years before his death.

It appears that this young Prince, even from the beginning of his Rule, did for well husband that poor flock that he received from his Father, of ten Chariots, fifty Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot, that he might seem likely to prove a thriver. Amongst other circumstances, the words which he spake to Elisba the Prophet, argue no less. For Josiah visiting the Prophet, who lay sick, spake unto him thus, O my Father, my Father, the Chariots of Israel, and the Horsemen of the same: by which manner of speech he did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy Man had freed his Kingdom in more stead than all the Horses and Chariots could do.

This Prophet who succeeded unto Elisba, about the fifth year of Joram the son of Achaz King of Israel died (as some have probably collected) about the third or fourth year of this Josiah, the Nephew of Jehu. To shew how the spirit of Elisba was doubled, or did rest upon him, it exceedeth my faculty. This is recorded of him, that he did not only raise a dead Child unto life, as Elisba had done, but when he himself was dead, it pleased God that his dead Bones should restore life unto a Carcase, which touched them in the Grave. In fine, he beloveth as a Legacy, three Victories upon King Josiah, who thereby did fit Israel in a fair way of recovering all that the Aramites had usurped, and weakening the Kings of Damascus in this sort, that they were never after terrible to Samaria.

SECT. VIII.

Of Amaziah his War against Edom; His Apostacy and overthrow by Josiah.

The happy success which Josiah had found in his War against the Aramites, was such as might kindle in Amaziah a desire of undertaking some expedition, wherein himself might purchase the like Honour. His Kingdom could furnish three hundred thousand servicable Men for the Wars, and his Treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, and the hire of many more. Cause of War he had very just against the Edomites, who having rebelled in the time of his Grand-father Jehoram, had about fifty years been unreclaimed, partly by reason of the troubles happening in Juda, partly through the sloth and timorousness of his Father Josiah. Yet, so far as he was the Men of Juda had in many years been without all exercise of War (excepting that unhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few Bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of wisdom to increase his Forces, with Soldiers waged out of Israel, whence he hired for an hundred talents of Silver, an hundred thousand and valiant men as the Scripture telleth us, though Josiah diminisheth the number, saying that they were but twenty thousand.

This great Army, which with so much cost Amaziah had hired out of Israel, he was fain to dismiss before he had employed it, being threatened by a Prophet with ill success, if he strengthened himself with the help of those Men, whom God (though in Mercy he gave them Victory against the cruel Aramites) did not love, because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this diminution, as an high disgrace, which to revenge, they fell upon a piece of Juda in their return, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand Men, and some spoil, which they carried away. But Amaziah with his own Forces, knowing that God would be assistant to their journey, entered courageously into the Edomites Country; over whom obtaining Victory, he slew ten thousand, and took other ten thousand Prisoners, all which he threw from an high Rock: holding them, it seems, rather as Traytors, than as just Enemies. This Victory did not seem to reduce Edom under the subjection of the Crown of Juda, which might be the cause of that severity, which was used to the Prisoners: the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the lives of their friends and kinsmen at so dear a rate, as the loss of their own liberty. Some Towns in Mount Seir, Amaziah took, as appears by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefensible, in that he left no Garrisons there, whereby he might another year the better have purified the Conquest of the whole Country. Howsoever it were, he got both Honour by the Journey, and Gains enough, had he not lost himself.

Among other spoils of the Edomites, were carried away their Gods; which being vanquished and taken Prisoners, did deserve well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwise, I know not by what strange witchcraft, so beloveth this unworthy King Amaziah, that he set them up to be his gods, and worshipped them, and burned incense unto them.

For this, when he was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, he gave a churlish and threatening answer, asking the Prophet, who made him a Counsellor, and bidding him hold his peace for fear of the world. If either the costly stuff, whereof these Idols were made, or the curious workmanship and beauty, with which they were adorned by Artificers, he should have rather turned them to matter of Profit, or kept them as household Ornaments and things of Pleasure, than thereby have suffered himself to be blind, with such unreasonable devotion towards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to work much upon his imagination; much more should the bad service which they had done to their old Clients, have moved him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seems to me, that the same affections carried him from God, unto the Service of Idols, which afterwards moved him to walk so roughly to the Prophet reproaching him. He had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such Auxiliary Forces as he had gathered out of Israel, which done, it is said, that he was encouraged, and led forth his People, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by Miracle, than let him fall of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason he should have limited his desires by the Will of God, whose pleasure it was that Edom having broken the yolk of Jacob from his neck, according as Israel had foretold, should no more become his servant. If therefore Amaziah did hope to reconquer all the Country of Edom, he failed of his expectations; yet so, that he brought home both Profit and Honour, which might have well contented with him.

But there is a foolish and a wretched Pride, wherein Men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe unto God the Honour of those Actions, in which it hath pleased him to use their own Industry, Courage, or fore-thought. Therefore it is commonly seen, that they who entering into Battle, are careful to pay for aid from Heaven, with due acknowledgment of his Power, who is the Giver of Victory; when the Field is won, do vaunt of their own exploits; one telling how he got such a ground of advantage; another, how he gave check to such a Battalion; a third, how he fixed on the Enemies Canon; every one striving to magnify himself, whilst all forget God, as one that had been present in the Action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another Mans virtue, is, I conceive, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which indeth better success, than he did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Author of his happiness; so he whose meer Wisdom and Labour hath brought things to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himself thankful, both for the Victory, and for those virtues by which the Victory was gotten. And indeed so far from weakness is the nature of such thanksgiving, that it may well be called the height of Magnanimity; no Virtue being so truly Heroical, as that by which the spirit of Man advanceth it felt with confidence of acceptance, unto the love of God. In which sense it is a brave speech that Esau in Virgil useth to Aeneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admiration.

With this Philosophy Amaziah (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his head: he had shed himself little a better Man of War than any King of Juda, since the time of Jehoshaphat, and could be well contented, that his People should think him little inferior to David, of which honour he saw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him loose an hundred talents, and done him no pleasures he having prevailed by plain force and good conduct, without any Miracle at all. That he was dittered with such vain thoughts as these (besides the wretchedness of his impiety following) Josiah doth tell us, saying, that he despised God, and that being put up with his good success, of which nevertheless he would not acknowledge God to be the Author, he commanded Josiah King of Israel to become his Subject, and to let the ten Tribes acknowledge him their Sovereign, as they had done their Ancestors King David and Solomon.

Some think that his quarrel to Josiah was rather grounded upon the injury done to him by the Israelites, whom he dismissed in the Journey against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stir him up, than the remembrance of an old Title, forgotten long since, and by himself neglected thirteen or fourteen years. Nevertheless it might be so, that when he was thus provoked, he thought it not enough to require new wrongs, but would also call old Matters into question; that to the Kings of Israel might, at the left, learn to keep their Subjects from offending Juda, for fear of endangering their own Crowns. Had Amaziah desired only recompense for the injury done to him, it is not improbable that he should have had some reasonable answer from Josiah, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answer which Josiah returned, likening himself to a Cedar, and Amaziah in respect of him to no better than a Thistle, shews that the challenge was made in insolent terms, their perhaps with such proud comparison of Nobility, as might be made (according to that which Josiah hath written) between a King of ancient Race, and one of less Nobility than Virtue.

It is by Sophocles reported of Ajax, that when going to the War of Troy, his Father did bid him to be as valiant, and get Victory by Gods assistance, he made him answer, That by Gods assistance a Coward could get Victory, but he would also get it without such help: After which proud speech, though he had many valiant Acts, he had small thanks, and finally, killing himself in a madness, whereunto he fell upon disgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of Burial. That Amaziah did utter such words, I do not find, but having once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such words, he was rewarded with success accordingly. The very first council wherein this War was concluded, serves to prove that he was a wise Prince indeed at Jersusalem, among his Parallels, but a fool when he did deal with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weak People, trusting more in the feat of their Country, than the valour of their Soldiers; and to encounter with Josiah, who from so poor beginnings had raised himself to such strength, that he was able to lend his Friend a hundred thousand Men; and had all his Nation exercised, and trained up in a brave speech that Esau in Virgil useth to Aeneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admiration.

fwade him to leave his lord behind; had not their good King delivered up hostages, to secure his return, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his pains taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this unhappy King: it had been well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his fault unto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But we find no mention of his amendment. Rather it appears, that he continued an Idolater to the very last. For it is said of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, he wrought treason against him in Jerusalem: a manifest proof that he was not reclaimed unto his lives end. And certainly, they which tell a Man in his adversity of his faults & sins, shall sooner be thought to upbraid him with his fortune, than to seek his reformation. Wherefore it is no marvel, that Priests and Prophets were less welcome to him, than ever they had been. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, wherof themselves might always be masters, wanted not plausible matter to revive him. For he was not the first, nor second of the Kings of Juda, that had been overcome in battle. David himself had abandoned the City, leaving it before the enemy was in sight, unto Abiathar his rebellious Son. Many besides him had received losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Josiah might so easily have been kept out; why did their Ancestors let Sesai in? Aza was reputed a virtuous Prince, yet with his own hands he emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessity of the State. Belike these traducers could commend no Actions but of dead Princes: if so, he should rather live to punish them, than die to please them. Though wherein had he given them any cause of displeasure? It was he indeed that commanded to let open the Gates to Josiah; but it was the people that did it. Good favours ought not to have obeyed their Masters Commandments to his disadvantage, when they law him not master of his own Person. As his captivity did acquit him from blame of all things that he did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it self, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his loss. For had he been as haughty to Ayas others were, he might have escaped as well as others did. But seeking to teach the base multitude courage by his Royal example, he was shamefully betrayed by those in whom he trusted. Unworthy creatures, that could readily obey him, when speaking another Mans words, being prisoner, he commanded them to yield: he bad them stand to it and fight like Men. The best was, that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand lives were saved; the enemy having wisely preferred the surprize of a Lion that was captured, before the chafe and slaughter of an Army of Stags that followed him.

Tis not the like words comforting Amaziah, were able to perfwade him, that it was even so indeed. And such excuses might have sufficed well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But he was unwilling to ascribe unto God the good success foretold by a Prophet; could easily find how to impute this late disaster unto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seems that he meant to keep himself safe from her by sitting still; for in fifteen years following (so long he outlived his honour) we find not that he stirred. As for his subjects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his government, yet we may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred to his own ruine. He that suspected his own worth or other Mens opinions, thinking the less regard is had of his Person than he believeth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authority in purulating the name of a fervent Man. For the affected frowardness of a vain fellow, doth many times resemble the gravity of one that is wise: and the fear wherein they live, which are subject unto oppression, carries a show of reverence to him that does the wrong; at least it serves to dazzle the eyes of underlings, keeping them from prying into the weakness of such as have jurisdiction over them. Thus the time, wherein, by well using it, Men might attain to such as they ought, they do usually miss spend, in seeking to appear such as they are not. This is a vain and deceivable course; more indignation, in stead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequence; especially when an unable Spirit, being over-perted with too high authority, is too passionate in the execution of such an office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amaziah thought by extreme rigour to hold up his reputation, what did he else than strive to make the people think he hated them, when of themselves they were apt enough to believe that he did not love them? the best was, that he had, by revenging his Fathers death, provided well enough for his own security: but who should take vengeance (or upon whom?) of such a murder, wherein every one had a part? Surely God himself, who had not given commandment or leave unto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the blood of his Anointed. Yet as Amaziah careless of God, was carried headlong by his own affections: to his subjects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged unto their duties, rose against him, with such head long fury, that being unable to defend himself in Jerusalem, he was driven to forsake the City, and fly to Lachis, for safeguard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceived against him, and so general, that neither his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capital City, nor his presence in the Country abroad procure friends to defend his life. Questionless he chose the Town of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found he there none other favour, than that the people did not kill him with their own hands; for when the Conspirators (who troubled not themselves about raising an Army for the matter) sent pursuers after, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the utmost City of his Dominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Juda; so that he might have made an easy escape (if he durst adventure) into the Territory of the Philistines, or the Kingdom of Israel. Therefore it may seem that he was detained there, where certain it is that he found no kind of favour: for had not the people of this Town added their own treason to the general infurrection; the murderers could not at so good leisure as they did, have carried away his body to Jerusalem, where they gave him burial with his Fathers.

SECT.

SECT. XI.

Of the Inter-regnum, or vacancy, that was in the Kingdom of Juda, after the death of Amaziah.

It hath already been shewed, that the Reigns of the Kings of Juda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by complete years, otherwhises, by years current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last year of his Fathers Reign, or the foremost of his Sons. But we are now arrived at a most vacation, wherein the Crown of Juda lay void eleven whole years: a thing not plainly set down in Scriptures, nor yet remembered by Josephus, and therefore hard to be believed, were it not proved by necessary consequence.

Twice we find it written, that Amaziah, King of Juda, lived after the death of Josiah King of Israel, fifteen years; whereupon it follows, that the death of Amaziah, was about the end of fifteen years complete, which Jeroboam the second (who in the fifteenth year of Amaziah was made King over Israel) had reigned in Samaria. But the succession of Uzziah, who is also called Asaiah, unto his Father in the Kingdom of Juda, was eleven years later than the sixteenth of Jeroboam: for it is expressed, that Asaiah began to reign in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam: the sixteenth year of his life, being joynted with the first of two and fifty that he reigned. So the Inter-regnum of eleven years cannot be divided, without some hard means used, of interpreting the Text otherwise than the letter sounds.

Yet some conjectures there are made, which tend to keep all even, without acknowledging any void time. For it is thought that in the place left of all cited, by the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam, we should perhaps understand the seven and twentieth year of his life; or else (because the like words are now where else interpreted in the like sense) that Asaiah was eleven years under age, that is five years old, when his Father died, and so his sixteenth year might concur with the seven and twentieth of Jeroboam; or that the Text it self might have suffered some wrong, by miswriting twenty seven for seventeen years; and so by making the seventeenth year of Jeroboam to be newly begun, all may be saved. These are the conjectures of that worthy Man Gerardus Mercator, the first of which I think it may suffice, as to the Author himself doth easily let it pass, as impossible; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that upon every doubt, we should call the text in question; which could not be falsified in all copies, if perhaps it were in one, as for the second it may be held with some qualification, that Asaiah began his Reign being five years old; but then must we add those eleven years which passed in his minority, to the two and fifty that followed his sixteenth year, which is all one in a manner, with allowing an Inter-regnum.

But why should we be so careful to avoid an Inter-regnum in Juda, seeing that the like necessity hath enforced all good Writers to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few years, in the Kingdom of Israel? The space of time between Jeroboam's death, and the beginning of Zachariah's reign, and such another gap found between the death of Peka, and the beginning of Hosea, have made it easily to be admitted into Samaria, which the consideration of things as they stood in Juda, when Amaziah was slain, doth make more probable to have hap-

For the publick fury having so far extended it self, as unto the destruction of the Kings own person, was not likely to be appeased without order taken for obtaining some redress of those matters, which had caused it at the first to break forth into such extremity. We need not therefore wonder how it came to pass, that they which already had shewn themselves into such an horrible treason, should afterwards dare to withhold the Crown from a Prince of that age, which being invested in all ornaments of Regality, is nevertheless exposed to many injuries, proceeding from head-strong, and forgetful subjects.

As for their conjecture, who make Asaiah to have been King but one and forty years after he came out of his non-age; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too hardly with the Text. The best opinion were that which gives unto Jeroboam eleven years of reign with his Father, before he began to reign single in the fifteenth of Amaziah; did it not swallow up almost the whole reign of Josiah, and extending the years of those which reigned in Israel; by making such of them completas as were only current) and take at the shortest the reigns of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: every Man may follow his own opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronological Table, drawn for these purposes.

SECT. XII.

Of Princes Contemporary with Amaziah, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

The Princes living with Amaziah, and in the eleven years that followed his death, were Josiah and Jeroboam in Israel; Ceplrenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Sylvius Abadims, and Sylvius Aventinus in Albia; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognetus Phereclus, and Atriphron in Athens; in Lacedaemon Theleides, in whole time the Spartans wan from the Achaians, Garanthes, Amylea, and some other Towns.

But more notable than all these, was Asyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth year of Amaziah, succeeding his Father Oroonazes or Anuonides, reigned twenty years, and was slain the last of the eleven void years which fore-went the reign of Asaiah. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thousand two hundred and forty years. A most luxurious and effeminate Pallard he was, passing away his time among strippers, whom he imitated both in apparel and behaviour.

In these voluptuous courses he lived an unhappy life, knowing himself to be so vile, that he durst not let any Man draw a sight of him; yet for he was at length, and the sight of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who governed Media under him, finding means to behold the person of his King, was so incensed with that beauly spectacle, of a Man disguised in Womens attire, and striving to counterfeit an Harlot, that he thought it a great shame to live under the command of so unworthy a Creature. Purposing therefore to free himself and others from so base subjection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Belsiff or Belsa a Chaldean, who told him plainly, that the Kingdom of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleased pleased with the Prophecy, did promise unto Belofus himself the government of Babylon and so concluding how to handle the business, one of them stirred up the Medes, and allured the Persians into the quarrel, the other persuaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themselves in the same cause. These four Nations armed forty thousand Men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himself, but gathering such forces as he could out of other Nations, encountered the rebels, as one that would by deeds refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that War, answer to the manner of his retrenches. For in three battles he carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such fearful terms, that had not Belofus promised them constantly some unexpected succours, they would forthwith have broken up their Camp. About the same time, an Army out of Babylonia was coming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountering it upon the way, persuaded so strongly by promise of liberty, that those forces joynted themselves with his. The sudden departure of the enemy seeming to be a slight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Army, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came upon him by night, and forced his Camp, which through over-great security was unprepared for resistance.

This overthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his Wives Brother Salammus to keep the Field, he withdrew himself into the City of Nineve; which, till new aids that he sent for should come, he thought easily to defend; it having been prophesied, that Nineve should never be taken, till the River were Enemy to the Town. Of the greatness and strength of Nineve, enough hath been spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well victualled, that Arbaces (having in two battles overthrown the Kings Army, and slain Salammus) was fain to be two whole years before it, in hope to win it by famine; whereof yet he saw no appearance. It seems that he wanted Engines and skill to force those Walls, which were an hundred foot high, and thick enough for three Chariots in front to pass upon the rampire. But that which he could not do in two years, the River of Tigris did in the third: for being high twolven with rains, it not only drowned a part of the City through which it ran, but threw down twenty furlongs of the Wall, and made a fair breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing no means of resistance left, shutting up himself into his Palace, with his Wives, Eunuchs, and all his Treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith he and they were together consumed. Strabo speaks of a Monument of his, that was in Anchiale, a City of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that he built that City Strabo, l. 9. and Tharsus upon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding Men eat and drink, and make merry, encouraged others with veries well known, to a voluptuous life, by his own example testified that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any vertue besetting a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end, saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him with a dagger. But the more general consent of Writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greek Writer, that lived in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be known. Diod. Siculus, l. 2. c. 7.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria, from the time of Semiramis, unto Sardanapalus, though I believe that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, incessantly) busied in offensive, or else defensive arms; yet for the most part of them I do better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were over passed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthy of memory. Whatsoever they did, that which Theophilus Antiochenus hath said of them is very true: Silence and Oblivion have oppressed them. Theophilus Antiochenus, l. 1. c. 21.

C H A P. XXIII.

Of UZZIAH.

S E C T. I.

The Prosperity of Uzziāz and of Jeroboam the second, who reigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchy that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Jeroboam. Of Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, and Pekahiah.

UZZIAH, who is called Ahaziah, the son of Josham, was made King of Juda, when he was sixteen years old, in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam the son of Josabab King of Israel. He served the God of his father David, and had therefore good success in all his enterprises. He built Eloth, a Town that stood near to the Red Sea, and restored it to Juda. He overcame the Philistines, of whose Towns he dismantled some, and built others in sundry parts of their Territories: Also he got the mastery over some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him Tribute. Such was the fruits of his prosperous Wars, wherein (as Josaphat rehearseth his acts) he began with the Philistines, and then proceeded unto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Army consisted of three hundred and seven thousand men of War, over which were appointed two thousand and six hundred Captains. For all this multitude the King prepared shields, and spears, and helmets, and other Arms requisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite unto that which some of his late Predecessors had held, who thought it better policy to use the service of the Nobility, than of the multitude; carrying forth to war the Princes, and all the Chariots.

As the Victories of Uzziah were far more important, than the achievements of all that had reigned in Juda, since the time of David; so were his riches and magnificent works, equal, if not superiour to any of theirs that had been Kings between him and Solomon. For, besides that great conquests are wont to repay the charges of War with triple interest, he had the skill to use, as well as the happiness to get. He turned his lands to the best use, keeping Plough-men and Dressers of Vines, in grounds convenient for such husbandry. In other places he had Cattel feeding; whereof he might well keep great store, having won so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of vast ground serving for pasture. For defence of his Cattel and Herdsmen, he built Towers in the Wildernels. He also digged many Cisterns or Ponds. Josaphat calls them Water-courses; but in such dry grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towers he commanded the water, that none could without his consent, relieve themselves therewith, questionless he took the only course, by which he might securely hold the Lordship over all the Wildernels; it being hardly possible, by reason of the extreme drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the use of Travellers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of sundry Towns among the Philistines; he repaired the wall of Jerusalem, which Josabab had broken down, and fortified it with Towers, whereof some were an hundred and fifty Cubits high.

The state of Israel did never so flourish, as at this time, since the division of the twelve Tribes into two Kingdoms. For as Uzziah prevailed in the South, so (if not more) Jeroboam the son of Josabab, King of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories against the Syrians, he won the Royal City of Damascus, and he won Hamath, with all the country thereabout, from the entering of Hamath, unto the Sea of the Wildernels; that is (as the most expound it) unto the vast deserts of Arabia, the end whereof was undiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in time of this Jeroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had been in the reign of David.

But it was not for the piety of Jeroboam, that he thrived so well, for he was an Idolater. It was only the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction wherewith the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the succession of war, and to throw the victorious Aramites under the feet of those whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Jehu to which God had promised the Kingdom of Israel unto the fourth generation, was now not far from the end; and now again it was invited to repentance by new benefits, as it hath been at the beginning. But the son of Jeroboam the son of Nebat was held so precious, that neither the Kingdom it self given to him by God, was able to draw Jehu from that politick Idolatry: nor the misery falling upon him and his posterity, to bring them to a better Course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great Prosperity of Jeroboam the son of Josabab, to make him render the honour that was due to the only Giver of victory. Wherefore the promise of God made unto Jehu, that his sons, unto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but being almost expired, gave warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that we who find no particulars recorded, can hardly guess at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

When Jeroboam the son of Josabab, after a victorious reign of one and forty years, had ended his life; it seems in all reason that Zachariah his son should forthwith have been admitted to reign in his stead; the Nobility of that race having gotten such a lustre by the immediate succession of four Kings, that any Competitor, had the Crown passed by election, must needs have appeared base; and the virtue of the last King having been so great, as might well serve to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the already confirmed right of a family fo rooted in poffeffion. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twenty years did pafs before Zacharia the Son of Jerobam was, by uniform confent, received as King. The true original caufes hereof were to be found at Dan and Rehob, where the golden Calves did ftand; yet fecond Infruments of this difturbance are likely not to have been wanting, upon which the wil-dom of man was ready to call an eye. Probable it is, that the Captains of the army (who afterwards flew one another fo fift, that in fourteen years there reigned five Kings) did now by head-ftong violence, rend the Kingdom afunder, holding each what he could, and either difpofing, or hatting fome qualities in Zacharia's; until, after many years, being wearied with diftention, and the principal of them: perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they confented to yield all quietly to the fon of Jerobam. That this Anarchy lafted almoft three and twenty years, we find by the difference of time between the fifteenth year of Uzzia, which was the laft of Jerobam his one and fortieth (his feven and twentieth concurring with the firft of Uzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the fame Uzzia, in the laft fix months whereof Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are fome indeed that by fuppo-fing Jerobam to have reigned with his father eleven years, do cut of the interregnum in Juda (before men-tioned) and by the fame reafon abridge this Anarchy that was before the reign of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leave it twelve years long: which is time to prove that the Kingdom of the ten tribes was no lefs diftempered than as is already noted. But I choofe rather to follow the more common opinion, as con-curring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the World, than this doubtful conjecture: that gives to Jerobam two and fifty years, by adding three quarters of his fathers reign unto his own: which was it felt indeed fo long, that he may well feem to have begun it very young. For I do not think that God bleffed this Idolater both with a longer reign, and with a longer life than he did his fervant David.

Thus much being foken of the time wherein the throne of Israel was void, before the reign of Zacharia's little may fuffice to be faid of his reign it felf, which lafted but a little while. Six months only was he King; in which time he declared himfelf a worthipper of the golden Calves; which was enough to juftifie the judgment of God: whereby he was flain. He was the laft of Jehu's houfe, being (includingly) the firft of that line, which may have been fome caufe of the troubles impeaching his orderly fucceffion: the prophetic having determi-ned that race in the fourth generation. But (befides that God's promife was extended to the utmost) there was no warrant given to Sallum, or to any o-ther, for the death of Zacharia, as had been given to Jehu for the flaugter of Jeoram, and for the era-dication of Abah's houfe.

Zacharia having been fix months a King, was then flain by Sallum, who reigned after him, the fpace of a month in Samaria. What this Sallum was I do not find; fave only that he was a Traytor, and the fon of one Jahsh, whereby his father got no honour. It feems that he was one of thofe who in time of faction had laboured for himfelf, and now, when all other Competitors were fitten down, thought eafily to prevail againft that King in whole perfon the race of Jehu was to fail. Manifeft it is that Shallum had a ftrong party, for Tiphah or Thaphah, and the coaft thereof even from Tirzah, where Menabem, his enemy and fupplanter, then lay, refufed to admit, as King in his ftead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one month, Sallum received the reward of his treafon, and was flain by Menabem who reigned in his place.

Menabem the fon of Gadi, reigned after Sallum ten years. In oppofition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane, for he not onely destroyed Tiphah, and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ftript up all their women with child, becaufe they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty been ufed in reveng of Zacharia's death, it is like that he would have been as earnest, in pro-secuting unto him his fathers Crown when it was fit due. But in performing that office, there was ufed fuch long deliberation, that we may plainly difcover Ambition, Difdain, and other private pallions, to have been the caufes of this bloody outrage.

In the time of Menabem, and (as it feems) in the beginning of his reign, Pul, King of Affria, came againft the land of Israel, whom this King ap-pealed, with a thoufand talents of filver, levied up-on all the fubftantial men in his country. With this money the Israelite purchafed, not only the peace of his Kingdom; but his own eftablifhment therein: fome fadious man (belike) having either invited Pul thither, or (if he came uncalled) fought to ufe his help, in depofing this ill-belov'd King. Joseph reports of this Menabem, that his reign was no more than his entrance. But after ten years, his Ty-ranny ended with his life: and Pekahia his Son suc-ceeded in his room.

Of this Pekahia the ftory is fhort: for he reigned only two years, at the end whereof he was flain by Pekah the fon of Ramalia, whole treafon was rewarded with the Crown of Israel, as in time coming, another mans Treafon againft himfelf fhall be. There needs no more to be faid of Menabem and his fon, fave that they were both of them Idolaters, and the fon (as we find in Joseph) like to his father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Affrian King, who firft opened unto thofe Northern Nations the way into Paleftina; it will fhortly follow in order of the Story, to deliver our opinion: whether he were that Belfus (called alfo Belfer, and by fome Phul Belochus) who joy-ned with Arbaces the Median againft Sardanapalus, or whether he was fome other man. At the prefent it is more fit that we relate the end of Uzzia's life, who our lived the happinefs wherein we left him.

SECT. II.

The end of Uzzia his Reign and Life.

AS the zeal of Jehojada that godly Priefl was the mean to prefeve the lineage of David in the perfon of Josias, fo it appears: that the care of holy men was not wanting to Uzzia, to bring him up and advance him to the Crown of Juda, when the hated born to his Father Azaziah had endangered his fucceffion. For it is faid of Uzzia, That he fought God in the days of Zacharia (which underftand the affifts of God) and when as he fought the Lord, God made him profper.

But, when he was ftrong, his heart was lifted up to his deftruftion: for he tranfgreffed againft the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burn incenfe upon the Altar of incenfe. Thus he thought to enlarge his own authority, by meddling in the Priefts office, whole power had in every extremity been fo helpful to the Kings of Juda, that meer gratitude and civil policy, fhould have held back Uzzia from increaching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had been filent in this cafe, and not forbidding it. Howfoever, the King forgot his Duty, the Priefts remembred theirs, and God forgot not to affift them. Azaziah the high Priefl interrupted the Kings pur-pofe, and gave him to underftand how little to his honour it would prove, that he took upon him the Office of the fons of Aaron. There were with Azaziah fourfcore other Priefts, valiant men, but their valour was fhewed only in affilting the high Priefl, when (according to his duty) he reprehended the Kings prefumption. This was enough, the reft God himfelf performed.

We read in Josephus, that the King had apparelled himfelf in Prieftly habit, and that he threatened Azaziah and his Companions, to punifh them with death, unlefs they would be quiet. Josephus indeed enlargeth the Story, by inferring a great Earthquake, which did tear down half an Hill, that rowled four furlongs, till it refled againft another Hill, flopping up the high-ways, and fpoiling the Kings Garden in the Pallage. With this Earth-quake, he faith, that the Roof of the Temple did cleave, and that a Sun beam did light upon the Kings face, which was prefently infected with Leprofie. All this may have been true, and fome there are who think that this Earth-quake is the fame, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos: wherein they do much mifreckon the times. For the Earth-quake foken of by Amos, was in the days of Jerobam King of Israel, who dyed feven and thirty years before Uzzia, fo that Jaham the fon of Uzziah, which fupplied his Fathers place in government of the Land, fhould, by this account, have been then unborn: for he was but five and twenty years old, when he began to reign as King. Therefore thus far only we have affurance: that while Uzzia was weak with the Priefts, the Leprofie rofe up in his forehead, he faw the Priefts. Hereupon he was caufed in all hafte to depart thence, and to live in a houfe by himfelf until he died, the rule over the Kings Houfe, and over all the Land, being committed to Jaham his Son and Succeffor. Jaham took not upon himfelf the title of a King, till his Father was dead: whom they buried in the fame Field wherein his Anceftors lay interred, yet in a Monument apart from the reft, becaufe he was a Leger.

SECT. III.

Of the Prophets which lived in the time of Uzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Egypt, and in fome other Countries.

IN the time of Uzzia were the firft of the leffer Pro-phets, Hofea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah and Jonas. It is not indeed fet down, when Joel or Obadiah did prophesy, but if the Prophets, whole times are not ex-pressed, ought to be ranged (according to Saint Hierom's rule,) with the next before them: then muft thefe two be judged contemporary with Hofea and Amos, who lived under King Uzzia. To enquire which of thefe five was the moft ancient, it may per-haps be thought, at leaft, a fuperfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer lived hath fo plentifully been fought, without reprehention, how can he be taxed, which offers to fearch out the antiquity of thefe holy Prophets?

It feems to me that the firft of thefe in order of time, was the Prophet Jonas, who foretold the great Viftories of Jerobam King of Israel, and therefore is likely to have propheticd in the days of Josias, whilst the afflictions of Israel was exceeding bitter: the Text it felf intimating no lefs: by which conle-quence he was elder than the other Prophets, whole works are now extant. But his Prophecies that concerned the Kingdom of Israel are now loft: that which remaineth of him, feems, not without rea-son unto fome very learned, to have belonged unto the time of Sardanapalus, in whole days Ninive was firft of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Chrift by his Sufferings, than by his Writings, now extant: in all the reft are found exprefs promifes of the Miffias.

In the Reign of Uzzia likewise it was, that Ely the firft of the four great Prophets, began to feek his Vilions. This difference of Greater and Leffer Pro-phets is taken from the Volumes which they have left written, (as S. Auguftine gives reafon of the diftinction) becaufe the greater hath written larger Books. The Prophet Ely was great indeed, not only in regard of his much writing, or of his No-bility, (for their opinion is rejected, who think him to have been the Son of Amos, the Prophet) and the high account wherein he lived; but for the excellen-cy both of his file and argument, wherein he fo plain-ly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Paffion, and whole Hiftory of our Saviour, with the Calling of the Gen-tiles, that he might as well be called an Evangelift, as a Prophet; having written in fuch wife, That (as Hierom faith) one would think he did not foretel of prefent things to come, but compile an Hiftory of matters al-ready paff.

Bochoris was King of Egypt, and the ninth year of his reign, by our computation (whereof in due place we will give reafon) was current, when Uzzia took poffeffion of the Kingdom of Juda.

After the death of Bochoris, Affin followed in the Kingdom of Egypt: unto him fucceeded Amfis, and thefe two occupied that Crown fix years. Then Sabacus, an Ethiopian became King of Egypt, and held it fifty years, whereof the ten firft ran along with the laft of Uzzia his reign and life. Of thefe and other Egyptian Kings, more fhall be foken, when their affairs fhall come to be intermedd with the bufinefs of Juda.

In Athen, the two laft years of Atriphron his twenty, the feven and twentieth of Tofpafius, the twentyeth of Agamellor, and the three firft of Aelchylus his three and twenty, made even with the two and fifty of Uzzia: as befwifed did in Alba the laft feven of Silvius Aventinus his feven and thirty, together with the three and twenty of Amilius Probus, and two and twenty the firft of Silvius Pinarius. In Media, Arbaces began his new Kingdom in the firft of Uzzia, wherein, after eight and twenty years, his fon Sofarnus fucceeded him, and reigned thirty years. Of this Arbaces, and the divifion of the Affrian Empire, between him and others, when they had oppreffed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to ufe more particular difcource, that we may not wan-der in too great uncertainty in the ftory of the Affrian Kings, who have already found the way into Paleftina, and are not likely to forget it.

secure of the Sythians, and other warlike Nations on that side, might very well turn Southward, and try his fortune in those Kingdoms, whereto civil diffinition of the inhabitants, and the bordering envy of the Arabians and Armenians that Darius, Friends and Cousins to the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, did invite him. For this, and the other before alleged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be understood of Belus, even as by the names of Nabuchadnezzar, Darius, the Medes, Artaxerxes, and Ahasuerus, with the like, are thought, or known to be meant the same, whom prophane Historians, by names better known in their own Countries have called Nabopolassar, Caxares, and Artaxerxes: especially considering, that hereby we draw neither contradict any thing that hath been written of old, or need to trouble our selves or others with framing new conjectures. This in effect, is that which they allege in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once granted, other things of more importance will of themselves easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Belus, or some other man: the whole race of these Affrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found these famous Princes, Nabonassar, Mardocempadur, and Nabopolassar (famous for the Astronomical observations recorded from their times) is the main ground of this contention. If therefore Belus or Belus were that Pul that invaded Israel, if he and his posterity reigned both in Nineve and in Babylon, if he were father of Teglat-phal-Aser, from whom Salmanassar, Sennacherib, and Asahaddon descended; then it is manifest, that we must seek Nabonassar, the Babylonian King, among those Princes, yea and conclude him: to be none other than Salmanassar who is known to have reigned in those years which Ptolemy the Mathematician hath assigned unto Nabonassar. As for Mardocad, who supplanted Afar-haddan, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his Disputation.

But they that maintain the contrary part, will not be satisfied with such Conjectures. They lay hold upon the Conclusion, and by shaking that into pieces, hope to overthrow all the Premises upon which it is intended. For (say they) If Nabonassar that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanassar, or any of those Affrian Kings, then it is manifest that the races were distinct, and that Pul and Belus were several Kings. This consequence is to plain, that it needs no confirmation. To prove that Nabonassar was a distinct person from Salmanassar, are brought five Arguments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworn to hold the contrary.

For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon, and not of Affria: this is proved by his Name, which is usually Chaldean, whereas Salman, the first part of Salmanassar's name is proper to the Affrians.

It is likewise proved by the Astronomical observations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Affrians, do shew that Nabonassar, from whom Ptolemy draws that Epoch, or account of times, was a Babylonian and not Affrian.

Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the success of Nabonassar, which was Mardocempadur, called in his own language Mardac-ken-pad, but more briefly in Ezay his Prophecy, Mardac, by the former part of his Name; or Mardac Baladan, the son of Baladan. Now if Mardac the son of Baladan King of Babel were the son of Nabonassar, then was Nabonassar no other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of Affria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabonassar and Salmanassar, which in Greek or Latin writings, hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein.

So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereto Salmanassar carried captive some part of the ten Tribes, it may well be granted, that in the Province of Babylon, Salmanassar had gotten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it self.

To conclude, Mardocad began his reign over Babylon in the sixth year of Hesekias which time Salmanassar took Samaria: therefore if Salmanassar were King of Babylon, then must we say that he said Mardocad, yea, and Nabonassar, were all one man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Joseph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion founded upon likelihood of conjectures, hath drawn his proofs from matter of more necessary inference.

Touching all that was said before of Pul Belus, for the proving that Pul and Belus were not sundry Kings; Joseph Scaliger pities their ignorance, that have spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painful men he confesseth that they were, who by their diligence might have won the good liking of their Readers, had they not by mentioning Amius his Authors, given such offences that men refused thereupon to read their Books and Chronologies, A short answer.

For mine own part, howsoever I believe nothing that Amius his Barfius, Metallinus, and others of that stamp affirm, in respect of their bare authority; yet am I not so fœmish, but that I can well enough digest a good book, though I find the names of one or two of these good fellows alleged in it: I have (somewhat peradventure too often) already spoken my mind of Amius his Authors: Nevertheless, I may lay here again, that where other Historians are silent, or speak not enough, there may we, without blame, borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we find, and fervent to explain or enlarge it without improprieties.

Neither indeed are these honest and painful men (as Scaliger terms them, meaning, if I mistake him not, good silly fellows) who set down the Affrian Kings, not Pul forwards, as Lords also of the Affrians: taking Pul for Belus, and Salmanassar for Nabonassar, such Writers, as a man should be ashamed or unwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Amius, though disliking him in general) Hesekiel is not to be slighted a Chronologer, that he should be laughed out of doors with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons between Scaliger and Mercator: they were both of them men notably learned: let us examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force as cannot either be refuted or avoided. It will easily be granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon: that he was not King of Affria, some men doubt whether Scaliger's reasons be enough to prove. For though Nabonassar be a Chaldean name, and Salmanassar an Affrian; yet what hinders us from believing that one man in two languages might be called by two several names? That Astronomy flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to prove Nabonassar either an Affrologer or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himself calls them. Propheta mſio quo, qui Nabonassarum Astrologum fuisse in somniis videmus, Propetia I know not who, that in their sleep have dreamt of Nabonassar, that he was an Astrologer.

Whether

Whether Nabonassar were an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintain the negative: But as his being Lord over the Chaldeans, doth not prove him to have been learned in their sciences; so doth it not prove him not to have been also King of Affria. The Emperor Charles the fit, who was born in Gant, and Philip his son, King of Spain, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men far more learned in all Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then living in Spain, if Spain at that time had any; yet I think, Posterity will not use this as an argument, to prove that Spain was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanassar or Nabonassar did use the Affrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Scholars; but it seems, that he and his posterity, by giving themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation; left the richer, out of which they first issued, as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two unanswerable arguments (as Scaliger terms them, being rethinks none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alleged on the contrary side) one of them which is drawn from the unlike found and writing of these names Salmanassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is not likeness of found, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted, which is, that Salmanassar might be Lord of some place in the Province of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it self: this indeed might be, and it might be otherwise. His reasons are nothing save conjecture. But in that which is alleged out of the Prophet Ezay concerning Mardocad the son of Baladan, and in that which is said of this Mardocad, and Mardocempadur, his being the successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to reign in the sixth year of Hesekia, I find matter of more difficulty, than can be answered in half. I will therefore defer the handling of these objections until I meet with their subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hesekia, wherein Mardocad lived, and was King. Yet that I may not leave too great a scruple in the mind of the Reader, that far will I here satisfy him; that how strong soever this argument may seem, Scaliger himself did live to retract it, ingeniously confessing, that in thinking Mardocad to be the son of Nabonassar, he had been deceived.

Now therefore let us consider, in what fort they have fashioned their Story, who taking Pul to be a distinct person from Belus or Belus, have in like sort, as was necessary, distinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to fall in Afar-haddan, which left all to Mardocad the Babylonian. And here I must first confess my want of books, if perhaps there be many, that have gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present unto us the body of this History in one view. Divers, indeed, there are, whom I have seen, that since Joseph Scaliger delivered his opinion, have written in favour of some one or other point thereof: but Sebus Calvisius himself, who hath abridged Scaliger's learned Work, De emendatione Temporum, hath not been careful to give us notice, how long Belus, Baladan, Pul, or Teglat-Pulassar did reign (perhaps because he found it not expressed in Scaliger) but is content to let down Baladan, for the same person with Nabonassar, which Scaliger himself revoked.

In this case therefore I must lay down the plot of these divided Kingdoms, in such sort as I find it com-

ceived by Augustinus Tornilius; who one of all that I have seen, sets down the succession, continuance, and acts, of those that reigned in Affria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belus, and his Posterity, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Tornilius is a regular Clerk of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annals were printed the last year; he appears to me a man of a curious industry, sound judgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it wilfully) forgetful of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Books he hath received good information, and enriched his works by inferring some what of theirs. But in this business he hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose help, without wrong or dishonour to himself, he hath both used and acknowledged. For mine own part, I will not spare to do right unto Tornilius; but confess my self to have received benefit by his writing, and with that his Annals had sooner come to light; for that as he hath confirmed me in some things, so would he have instructed me and imboldened me to write more fully and less timorously in other things, which now I have no leisure to revise. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly delivered, and yet feared led it had over hastily passed out of my hand, and been exposed to other mens constructions) of the four Kings that invaded the Valley of Siddim, and were slain by Abra- Cap. 11. ham, I find him adventuring as I have done, to say, Sid. 13. that they may probably be thought to have been some petty Lords; the contrary opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let us consider how he hath ordered these last Affrian and Babylonian Kings. After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Araces, being the most mighty, fought to get all to himself, but was opposed by Belus, in which contention, one Pul, a powerful man in Affria, sided with Belus, and that two prevailed so far, that finally Araces was constrained to share the Empire with them, making such a division thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire between Othavian, Anthony, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Tornilius himself made this, or the rest made of it) that Araces made himself Sovereign Lord of all, and that the defeat of his Empire in M. B. at Sid. 13. was the first year of his reign, and that Pul and Belus reigned in short space, that is, in four years, it cannot be by the just judgement of God, that Pul and Belus rebelled against Araces, like as Araces had done against Sardanapalus; and instead of being Victories, made themselves absolute Kings. And to this latter opinion Tornilius himself leans, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former supposing, resolving to hold the latter, I shall anon, without any wrong to him make bold to guess. Having thus devised how Pul and Belus might, at the first, attain to be Kings, he orders their time and their successions in this manner.

Four years after Araces, Pul begins to reign, and continues eight and forty years. Teglatphalassar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I write diversely, according to the Authors whom I have in hand are pleased to diversify them) succeeded unto Pul, reigned thirty and twenty. Salmanassar followed him, and reigned ten. After him Sennacherib reigned seven: and when he was slain, Afar-haddan his son, ten years: in whom that line ended.

The same time that Pul took upon him as King of Affria, or not long after (why not rather after? for for so it had been more likely) Belsus usurped the Kingdom of Babylon, and held it threecore and eight years; at the least, threecore and eight years did pass before Nabonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonassar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinks to be Baldus, are assigned six and twenty years: then two and fifty to Merodach, or Mardochempadus: four and twenty to Ben Merodach: and lastly, one and twenty to Nabonassar the father of Nebuchodonosor; who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the original of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kingdoms, I may truly say, That the conjectures of other men, who give all to Belsus, and confound him with Phul, appear to me more nearly resembling the truth. Neither do I think, that Tornilius would have conceived two different waies by which Phul might have gotten Assyria (for how Belsus came to get Babylon, it is plain enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. He addresses to the latter of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceived, that to make Phul on a sudden King of Assyria, or to give him to noble a Province, as would, of it self, invite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most unlikely to have happened, unless his defects (whereof we find no mention) were proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath he devised the means, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, Why this Phul being one of the three that divided all between them, was utterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this division it self, and the civil wars that caused it, were never heard of? Questionless, the intervening of some treasures by Belsus, with his Judgment, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre less note. Therefore I do not see, how one of the two inconveniencies can this way be avoided; but that either we must confesse the Dominion given to Phul to have been exceeding his merits; or else his merits, and name withal, to have been frangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make us think, that rather the conjecture, inferring such a sequel, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul, and Belsus, against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Assyrians to recover such strength in four years, as might serve to hold out in rebellion; for Belsus it was needfull to consider, confiding, that Arbaces did not seek to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an over great-favourer of liberty) even the Medes that were under his own Government, to do what they listed.

But it is now fit that we peruse the Catalogue of these Kings, not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their own times) but speaking of their order and time in general. If it be to us unlawful to think, that some of Annus his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may be true, especially such as contradict not acknowledged truth, or apparent likelihood; why then is it said, that Phul did reign in Assyria eight and forty years? For this hath no other ground than Annus. It is true that painful and judicious Writers have found this number of years to agree fitly with the course of things in History: yet all of them took it from Annus. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annus his forgery (as questionless he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probability, he be not believed for his own sake; though for our own sakes we make use of his boldness, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) we are unwilling our selves to be Authors of new, though not unprofitable conjectures. Herein we shall have this commodity, that we may without blushing after a little, to help our own opinions, and lay the blame upon Annus, against whom we shall be sure to find friends that will take our part.

The reigns of Theglathabalar and Salmassar did reach, by Annus his measure, to the length of five and twenty years the one, and seventeen the other; Tornilius hath cut off two from the former, and seven from the latter of them, to fit (as I think) his own computation: using the liberty whereof I spake last: for that any Author, gave out good Metaphors, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did reign, it is more than I have yet found. To Senacherib and Arladadus, Tornilius gives the same length of reign, which is found in Metaphors; I think there are not many, that will arrogate so much unto themselves, as may very well be allowed unto a man so judicious as is Tornilius; and yet I could wish that he had forbore to condemn the followers of Annus in this business, wherein he himself hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must have done, almost nothing.

The like liberty we find that he used in the measuring the reigns of the Chaldeans, filling up all the space between the end of Sardanapalus and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the threecore and eight years of Belsus. In this respect it was, perhaps, that he thought Belsus might have begun his reign somewhat later than Phul: for threecore and eight years would seem a long time for him to hold a Kingdom, that was no young man when he took possession of it. But how is any whit of this age abated by shortning his reign, facing his life eacheth to the end of such a time, as were alone without adding the time wherein he was a private man, enough for a long liver? Indeed eight and forty years have been somewhat of the most, considering that he seems by the story to have been a little less at such time as he joynted with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twenty years, did well deserve that note (which Tornilius adroitly gives) that if his reign extended not so far, then the reign of such as came after him, exceeding the middle time, unto Nabonassar.

I neither do reprehend the boldness of Tornilius, in conjecturing, nor the modesty of Scaliger and Severus Celsus, in forbearing to set down as warrantable, such things as depend only upon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from us by Antiquity, must be described in History, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countries, whereof as yet there is made no true discovery, that is, either by leaving some part blank, or by inserting the land of Pigmies, Rocks of Load-one, with Head lands, Bays, great Rivers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrary to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from distance of place, allows not such liberty to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remediless oblivion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith.

Neque ferocibus

Mundi, nec Boreæ finitimum latus, Duratæque Sole Nives,
Mercatorem abigunt; horrida calidi

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

AFTER the division of the Assyrian Empire, follows the institution of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reign of the same King Uzzias and in his one and fiftieth year. It is, I know, the general opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus in the first of Jubas: yet is not that opinion to general, but that Authors, weighty enough, have given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things unto the sacred History, that in fitting those things unto the sacred History, should not be too careful of drawing the Authors, to those works of time, which had no reference to their affairs, it is enough, that setting in good order these beginnings of accounts, we joynt them to matters of Israel and Juda, where occasion requires.

These Olympian games and exercises of activity, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his own foot: by which Pythagoras found out the state and likely strength of Hercules his body. They took name not from the Mountain Olympus, but from the City Olympia, otherwise Piza, near unto Elis: where also Jupiter's Temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the Wonders of the World, was known by the name of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius. These games were exercised from every fourth year complete, in the Plains of Elis, a City of Peloponnesus, near the River Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many years, till Iphitus, by advice of the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, till Cergus the Law-giver then living: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the reign of Theodosius the Emperour, according to Cadrenus: others think that they were dissolved under Constantine the Great.

From this institution, Varro accepted the Grecian times and their stories to be certain: but reckoned all before, either doubtful or fabulous: and yet Plinius gives little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the reign of Cyrus, who began in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eusebius out of Diodore, Cassius, Polibius, and others, hath gathered, in whose time the seven wife Cressus flourished. For Salon had speech with Cressus, and Cressus was overthrowen and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing brains have laboured to find out the certain beginning of the Olympiads, namely, to set them in the true year of the World, and the reign of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first account, that is, of the Worlds year, they can hardly jump in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril against Julian, and Dydimus begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Osar, or Azarias.

Eusebius, who is contrary to himself in this reckoning, accounts with those that find the very first Olympiad in the beginning of the four hundredth and sixtieth year after Troy; yet he telleth us that it was in the fiftieth year of Uzzias, which is (as I find it) two years later.

Erasmus placeth the first Olympiad four hundred and seven years after Troy, reckoning the years that passed between; to whom Dionysius Halicarnassensis is also of opinion.

Nor Southern heat, nor Northern Snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow
The Subjects Regions can Kneel, And keep the greedy Merchant thence:
The fabble Shipmen want to find,
Storm never fo the Seas with Wind.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, do serve only to mislead such discoverers as rashly believe them, drawing upon the publishers, either some angry curies or well deserved scorn; but to keep their own credit, they cannot serve always. To which purpose I remember a pretty jolt of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spanish Gentleman, who had been employed by his King in planting a Colony upon the Straights of Magellan: for when I asked him, being then my Prisoner, some questions about an Island in those Straights, which, me-thought, might have done either benefit or disservice to his enterprise, he told me merrily that it was to be called the Painters wives Island, saying, That whilst the fellow drew that Map, his wife sitting by, desired him, to put in one Country for her that she in imagination might have an Island of her own. But in filling up the blanks of old Histories, we need not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time shall run backward, and by restoring the things themselves to knowledge, make our conjectures appear ridiculous: What if some good copy of any ancient Author, could be found, shewing (if we have it not already) the perfect truth of these uncertainties? would it be more shame to have believed in the mean while, Annus or Tornilius, than to have believed nothing? Here I will not say, that the credit which we gave to Annus, may chance otherwise to be given to some of those Authors whose names he pretends. Let it suffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Tornilius, than Annus, yet him than them, if his assertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approved Histories than their conjectures, as in this point it seems to me: it having moreover gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions, to have once gotten the credit of being general, to do as Pausanias in Capsa did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senators of the City to death. He locked the Senators up within the Statehouse, and offered their lives to the peoples mercystaining thus much, that none of them should perish, until the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was hasty; for as fast as every name was read, all the town cried, Let him dye: but the execution required more leisure; for in substituting of another, some notorious vice of the person, or baseness of his condition, or sufficiency of his quality, made each new one that was offered, to be rejected: so that finding the worse and less choice, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lack of better.

nascent, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others

The distance between the destruction of Troy and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratosthenes. From the taking of Troy to the descent of Hercules his posterity into Peloponnesus, were four score years; thence to the Trojan expedition, three score years; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his government in Sparta, one hundred fifty nine; and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eighty years. In this account the first year of the first Olympiad is not included.

But vain labour it were to seek the beginning of the Olympiads by numbering the years from the taking of Troy, which is of date far more uncertain. Let it suffice that by knowing the inauguration of these games to have been in the four hundred and eighth year current after Troy, we may reckon back to the taking of that City, setting that, and other accidents which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads must needs teach us how to find when they began.

To this good use we have the ensuing years unto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided by the fame Eratosthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads to the passage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundred four score and seventeen years; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian War, eight and forty years; forwards to the victory of Lysander, seven and twenty; to the battle of Leuctra, thirty four; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, five and thirty; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole sum arithmetically to 453 years; which number he otherwise also collecteth, and it is allowed by the moſt.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth year of Uzzias, we have arguments grounded upon that which is certain, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his reign, and the death of Alexander, as also upon the Astronomical calculation of sundry Eclipses of the Sun; as of that which happened when Xerxes set out of Sardis with his Army to invade Greece; and of divers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reign as King, before he was Lord of the great Monarchy, began the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he reigned thirty years: they who give him but twenty nine years of reign (following Hieronymus rather than Tully, Justin, Eusebius, and others) begin a year later, which comes all to our reckoning. So is the death of Alexander fixed by all good Writers in the first year of the hundred and fourteenth Olympiad. This latter note of Alexander's death serveth well to lead us back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like observations do. For if we reckon upwards from the time of Alexander, we shall find all to agree with the years of the Olympiads wherein Cyrus began his reign, either as King, (or taking the word Monarch to signify a Lord of many Kingdoms) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, unto the end of the Perſian Empire, which was in the third of the hundred and twentieth Olympiad, we find two hundred and thirty years complete: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchy, which lasted but seven years, we find complete two hundred and seven years, which was the continuance of the Perſian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first year of Cyrus his Monarchy (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundred and fortieth year from the institution of those games by Iphitus) followed the last of the seventy years captivity of Juda, and desolation of the land of Israel. Manifest it is, that we must reckon back those seventy years, and one hundred and three score, and ten years more, the last which passed under the Kings of Juda, to find the first of these Olympiads; which by this account, is the one and fiftieth of Uzzias, as we have already noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serve well to the same purpose. For example sake; that which was seen when Xerxes mustered his Army at Sardis, in the two hundred three score and seventh year of Nabonassar, being the last of the three score and fourteenth Olympiad, leads us back unto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we have a fair way through the three score and ten years, unto the destruction of Jerusalem; and so upwards through the reigns of the last Kings of Juda, to the one and fiftieth year of Uzzias.

Thus much may suffice concerning the time wherein these Olympiads began.

To tell the great solemnity of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece, they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say, that all bodily exercises, or the moſt of them, were therein practised as Running, Wrestling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they only contend for the Mastery in those feats, whereof there was good use, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kind of Exercises, that served only for ostentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable quality, to make trial of their skill. Yea, the very Cryers which proclaimed the Victories, contended which of them should get the honour of having plaid the best part.

The Eleans were Presidents of those Games, whose justice, in pronouncing without partiality who did best, is highly commended. As for the Rewards given to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palm or Olive, without any other commodity following than the Reputation. Indeed these needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diogenes had seen his three sons crowned for their several Victories in those Games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morere Diogenes, non enim in Calum ascensusus es, that is, Die, Diogenes, for thou shalt not climb up to Heaven; as if there could be no greater happiness on earth, than what already had befallen him.

In like fence Horace speaks of these Victories, calling them,

Quos Elea domum reducis Palma Celsiter.

Such as like heavenly lights do come
With an Elean Garland home.

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had won those Olympian prizes; but even grave Historians thought it a matter worthy their noting. Such was (as Tully counts it) the vanity of the Greeks Tully, in that have esteemed it almost as great an honour to have won the Victory at Running or Wrestling in those Games, as to have triumphed in Rome for some famous Victory or conquest of a Province.

That these Olympian Games were celebrated at the full of the Moon; and upon the fifteenth day of the Month Hecatombion, which doth answer to our June; and what means they used to make the Month begin with the new Moon, that the fifteenth day might be the full, I have shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now return unto the Kings of Juda, and leave the merry Greeks at their games, whom I shall meet in more serious employments, when the Perſian quarters draw the Body of the Hither, into the Coasts of Asia and Hellespont.

SECT. VI.

Of Jotham and his Contemporaries.

Jotham the son of Uzziah, when he was five and twenty years old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in Jerusalem, his Father yet living. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple, of three score cubits upright, and therefore called Ophel: besides divers Cities in the Hills of Juda, and in the Forreit, Towers and Palaces: He enforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver, an hundred talents, and of Wheat and Barly, two thousand measures. He reigned six and twenty years: of whom Josephus gives this testimony. Ejufmodi vero Princeps huius, ut nullum in eo virtutis genus desideret: ut qui Deum adeo pie coleretur, hominibus adeo iuste praesentibus, utrum isam tanta sibi curae esse possit, ut & laudare, et curare, et gubernare regnumque sibiis quidem minimè contentum, sed etiam, dumvisit autem ejus incolis ante ejus saltem, sanctum, et fortissimum sua virtute efficeret. This was such a Prince, a man could find no kind of virtue wanting in him: He worshipped God so religiously, he governed his men so righteously, he was so provident for the City and did so greatly amplify it, that by his virtue and proofs he made his whole Kingdom not contemptible to his Enemies, but to his Servants, Inhabitants and Citizens profectum and happy.

This is all that I find of Jotham: his reign was not long, but as happy in all things as he himself was devout and virtuous.

Anachorites about this time succeeded Phelisteus in Corinth: after whom the Corinthusians erected Magistrates which Governed from year to year. And yet Pausanias in his second Book, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was governed by Kings of the race of the Bacidae, to the time of Cysyllus, who drove them out.

Teglabaphazar, or Teglabaphazar, the son of Phul the second of the Babylonians and Affirians, that was of this new Race, about this time invaded Israel, while Pekah (who murdered his Master Pekachias) was King thereof. In which expedition he took moſt of the Cities of Negebah and Galilee, with those of Gilead over Jordan, and carried the Inhabitants captive. This Tiglab, reigned twenty five years according to Metasthenes. But Krenschman finds, that with his son Salmanassar he reigned yet two years longer; which years I would not ascribe to the son, because the Era of Nabonassar begins with his single reign, but reckon them to Tiglab Phulassar himself, who therewith reigned 27 years.

Ashbelys, the son of Agamemnon, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled twenty five years.

Alcamenes governed Sparta, after whom the Estate changed, according to Eusebius: But therein surely Eusebius is mistaken; for Diadore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others witness the contrary.

Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent virtues, succeeded his Father, and reigned sixty years, and out-lived the Metasthenes King of Asia.

which was ended by Theopompus, the son of Nicander, his Royal companion.

At this time lived Nabum the Prophet, who foretold the destruction of the Affirian Empire, and of the City of Babylon, which succeeded, (saith Josephus) a hundred and fifteen years after.

The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time; while in Media, Sardanapalus and Midas reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

SECT. VII.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

Achaz or Achaz, he succeeded to Jotham in the seventeenth year of Pekah, the son of Remaliah: the time being also the last of his Fathers reign, who began in the second of the fame Pekah, and reigned sixteen, but not complete years. This Achaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his Son for sacrifice before the Idol Moloch, or Satan, which was represented by a man-like brazen body, bearing the head of a Calf, set up not far from Jerusalem, in a Valley shadowed with Woods, called Gelboim or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is used for Hell. The Children offered, were included within the Carcases of this Idol, and as the fire increased, so the Sacrificers, filled the air to the end, the pitiful cries of the Children might not be heard: Which unnatural, cruel and diabolical Oblation, Jeremy the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierom upon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leviticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible fire was ancient. In the twelfth of Duteronomy, it is called an Abomination which God hateth.

That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Judea, divers Authors witness, as Virgil in the second Aeneid, Sanguine Placitis, &c.

And Silvius, Plutarch and Deur.

Satan is said to have brought this Custom into Italy; being the casting of many souls into the River of Tyber, in stead of which, Hercules commanded that the waxen Images of men should be thrown in and drowned.

The Devil also taught the Carthaginians this kind of murder, inasmuch that when their City was besieged, and in distress, the Priest made them believe that because they had spared their own Children, and had bought and brought up others to be offered, that therefore Satan had stirred up and strengthened their Enemies against them: whereupon they presently called two hundred of the noblest youths of their City to be slain, and offered to Satan, or Satan, as Eusebius saith, appease him: who, besides these fire-named Nations, had instructed the Rhodiens, the People of Cyrie, and Chios, of Massina, of Galatia, with the Massagets and others, in these his services. Further, as if he were not content to destroy the souls of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa (as Aeschylus writeth) the Mexicans and other People of America, were brought by the Devil under this fearful servitude, in which he also holdeth the Floridians and Virginians at this day.

For the wickedness of this King Achaz, God stirred up Keezin of Damascus, and Pekah the Son of Remaliah, King of Israel against him, who invaded Judea, and belated Jerusalem, but entered it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, revolted himself of Elah by the Red Sea, and call the Jews out of it; and Pekah slaughtered in one day an hundred and twenty thousand Judeans, of the abilit of the Kingdom, at which time Masfiah, the Son of Achaz, was also slain by Ziebr, with Azrikam the Governour of his house, and Eleanah the second person unto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women and children, the Israelites lead away to Samaria: but by the counsel of the Prophet Osai, they were returned and delivered back to Samaria.

As Isfrel and Aram vexed Juda on the North, so the Edomites and the Philistines, who were attended the ruin of Judea, entered upon them from the South, and took Bethsames, Ajalun, Gaderah, Shobos, Timnah, and Gemoz, slew many people, and carried away many prisoners. Whereupon when Achaz saw himself environed on all sides, and that his Idols and dead gods gave him no comfort, he sent to the Affrian Tiglab-Pileser, to desire some aid from him against the Israelites and Aramites, presenting him with the Silver and gold both of the Temple, and Kings house.

Tiglab-Pileser wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the trouble that befell Parolissia. His father having lately made himself from a Provincial Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Affria, had a little before led him the way into Judea, invyred by Menabem, King of Israel. Wherefore now the son willingly harkened to Achaz, and embraced the advantage. As for Belochus himself, he was content to assign some other time for going through with this enterprise: because (as I have said before) he was not firmly settled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were now, with the treasures of Jerusalem, prepared his Army, first invaded the Territory of Damascus, won the City, and killed Rezin the last of the race of the Adads, who began with David, and ended with this Achaz. At Damascus, Achaz met Tiglab, and taking thence a pattern of the Altar, sent it to Jerusalem the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Jerusalem, whereon at his return he burnt Sacrifice to the gods of the Syrians. In the mean while Tiglab pillaged all Bajan, and the rest beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribes of Ruben, Gad, and Manasse. And then passing the River, he battered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdom of Israel, and made them his Vassals. And notwithstanding that he was invited and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoil of Israel, he possessed himself of the greater part of Juda, and, as it seemeth, enforced Achaz to pay him tribute. For in the second of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechias, that he revolted from Affur, or rebelled against him, and therefore was invaded by Senacherib. After Achaz had beheld and born these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth year of his reign he died; but was not buried in the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda. With Achaz lived Medián, the third Prince in Medea, who governed 40. years, faith Ensebius: Diodorus and Ctesius find Antiochus instead of this Medián, to have been Sofarnus his successor, to whom they give 50. years.

Tiglab-Pileser held the Kingdom of Affria, all the reign of Achaz: yet so, that Salmassar his Son may seem to have reigned with him some part of the time. For we find that Achaz did send unto the Kings of Athor to help him. The Grecus note says, that these Kings of Affur, were Tiglab-Pileser, and those Kings that were under his Dominion, But that he or his Father had hitherto made such conquests, as might give him the Lordship over other Kings, I do neither find any History, nor circumstance that proveth. Wherefore I think that these Kings of Affur, were Tiglab, and Salmassar his Son, who reigned with his father, as hath been said before: though how long he reigned with his Father, it had been hard to define.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedemon, a hundred and thirty years after Lycurgus, according to Plutarch. Ensebius makes their beginning far later, namely, in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first; Theopompus and Polydorus, being then joyned Kings. These Ephori, chosen every year, were controllers, as well of their Senators, as of their Kings, nothing being done without their advice and consent. For (faith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls.

In the time of Achaz died Aeschylus, who had ruled in Athens ever since the fiftieth year of Uzzia, Alcamenon the thirtieth of the Madonide, or Governours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) succeeded his Father Aeschylus, and was the last of their Governours: he ruled only two years. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codrus) to Governours for life; which ending in this Alcamenon, they erected a Magistrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Burgho-Master or Governour of their City for ten years.

This alteration, Pausanias in his fourth Book begins in the first year of the eighth Olympiad, Ensebius and Halicanassus in the first of the seventh Olympiad: at which time indeed, Carop the first of these, began his ten years rule.

The Kingdom of the Latines, governed about three hundred year by the Sylvii, of the race of Aeneas, took end in the same Achaz's time: the foundation of Rome being laid by Romulus and Remus in the eighth year of the same King, Codoman builds it in the eleventh of Achaz. Eusebius in the eighth as I think he should; others somewhat later, and in the reign of Ezechias, Cicero, Eufrapius, Orsius, and others square the time of the foundation to the third year of the sixth Olympiad.

But Halicanassus, Solinus, Antiochus, Clement Alexandrinus, and Ensebius to the first year of the seventh: who seem not only to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to have kept herein the best account,

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the Antiquity of Italy, and the Foundation of Rome in the time of Achaz.

SECT. I.

Of the Inhabitants, and the Name of Italy.

AND here to speak of the more Ancient Names of Italy, and what Nations posessed it before the arrival of Aeneas, the place may seem to invite us; the rather, because much fabulous matter hath been mixed with the truth of those elder Plantations.

Italy, before the fall of Troy, was known to the Greeks by divers Names: as first Hesperia, then Ausonia; the one name arising of the Seat, the other of the Ausones, a People inhabiting part of it: One ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotrii, whom Halicanassus thinks to have been the first that brought a Colony of Arcadians into that Land. After it was called Italy of Italus; concerning which changes of Names, Virgil speaks thus:

Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque ubere gleba:
Oenotrii culvere viri, nunc fama, minores
Italiam dixisse, Ducis de nomine, gentem.*

This is a Land which Greek Hesperia names Ancient, and strong, of much fertility: Oenotrii held it, but we hear by fame, That by late ages of Posterity,

*Is from a Captains name call'd Italy.

Who this Captain or King may have been, it is very uncertain. For Virgil speaks no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued so long upon the whole Country, and worn out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to find out the original of this name, and the first Planters of this noble Country, Rymerus hath made a very painful search, and not improbable conjecture.

And first of all, he grounds upon that of Halicanassus, who speaks of a Colony which the Eleans did lead in Italy, before the name of Italy was given unto it.

Secondly, Upon that of Justin, who faith, that Brundisium was a Colony of the Aetolians.

Thirdly, Upon that of Strabo, who affirms the same of Temps, or Tempsa, a City of the Bractii in Italy.

Lastly, Upon the authority of Pliny, who shows that the Italians did inhabit only one Region of the Land, whence afterward the Name was derived over all.

Concerning that which is said of the Eleans and Aetolians who (as he shews) had one original; from them he brings the Name of Italy. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Atolia, save that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greek words is common; and the letter (e) is changed into (a)

which change is found in the name of Aetholia, an Island near Italy, peopled by the Aetolians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Aetolic Dialect; of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Aetolians) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius, Halicanassus, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach.

Hereunto appertains that of Julian the Apostata, who called the Greek colonies of the Latines. All the common Original of the Greek and Latine from Javan; and the fable of Javan, whose image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Italy, and was stamped on Coins, with a Ship on the other side, all which is, by interpretation, referred to Javan, father of the Greeks and Latines; who (saying over the Ionian Sea, that lies between Aetolia and the Western parts of Greece and Italy, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reinecius thinks, that the names of Atalus and Italus belonged both to one man, and thereto applies that of Bersar, who called Seibim, Italus; though it may seem strengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whilst he abode at Italy with Eletra, the daughter of Atalus, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, easily disproved. For when they make mention of Atalus, place him before the time of Mesa: and if Atalus were Ceibim, or Kitim, then was he the son of Javan, and Nephew of Japheth, the eldest son of Noah, which antiquity far exceeds the name of Italy, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Country, not long before the War of Troy.

Likewise Virgil, who speaks of Atalus, and of Dardanus, his marriage with Eletra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italy, but calleth Eletra and her sister Mais (poetically) the daughters of the Mountain in Africa, naming Idus among the Kings of the Aberigenes; which he would not have done, had Atalus and Italus been one person.

As for the authority of Bersar in this case, we need the less to regard it, for that Reinecius himself, whose conjectures are more to be valued than the dreams wherewith Antius hath filled Bersar, holds it but a figure.

That the name of Italy began long after Atalus, it appears by the verses of Virgil last rehearsed, wherein he would not have said,

—Nunc fama, minores
Italiam dixisse, Ducis de nomine, gentem, had that name been heard of ere Dardanus left the Country. But seeing that, when Hercules, who died a few years before the War of Troy, had left it

Italy

Italy a Colony of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the same Nation with the Ætolians, as Strabo, Hieronymus, and Pausanias teach) then the name of Italy began : and seeing Virgil makes mention of Italy among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldness to say, that Italy was a Commander of these Eleans. For though I remember not that I have read of any such Greek as was named Italy, yet the name of Atolus written in Greek Atolus, was very famous among the Ætolians, and among the Eleans, he being son of a King of Elis, and founder of the Ætolian Kingdom. Neither is it more hard to derive the name of Italy from Atolus, than Italia from Æolia. So may Virgil's authority stand well with the collections of Reyneccius ; the name of Italy being taken both from a Captain, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

SECT. II.

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reason of the names of Latini and Latium.

IN Italy the Latines and Heurians were most famous ; the Heurians having held the greatest part of it under their subjection, and the Latines by the virtue and felicity of the Romans, who were a branch of them, subduing all Italy, and in a few ages whatsoever was known in Europe ; together with all the Western parts of Asia, and North of Affrick.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Haliscarnassus, Varro, and Reyneccius (following them) think to have been Aræadians ; and this name of Aborigines (to omit other significations that are strained) imports as much as Original, or Native of the place, which they possessed ; while the Aræadians are known in vaunting manner to have always usurped, fetching their antiquity from beyond the Moon ; because indeed, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponnesus informed to forsake their seats to sit as other Greeks were, who did dwell without that half Island, neither had the Aræadians to insure a dwelling as the rest of the Peloponnesians, because the Country was less fruitful in land, mountains, and hard of access, and they themselves (as in such places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of these therefore having occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Aræadian manner, till themselves Aborigines, in that language, which either their new Seat, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might be that the Aræadians, who dwelt somewhat far from the Sea, and are always noted as unpep to prove good Mariners, should have been Authors of new discoveries, were a question not easy to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitfulness of children, in which those ages abounded, enforced the superstitious company to seek another feat, and that some expeditions of the Aræadians, as especially that of Evander, into the same parts of Italy, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelagi, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gave name to all Greece, and their antiquities are long since dead, for lack of good records. Neither was their glory fixt in Italy, as could long sustain the name of their own Tribe ; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Asynians, Aræadi, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following, disturb the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to some civility ; and he therefore canonized as a god.

This Saturne, S. Augustine calleth Stercus or Stercutius, others term him Stercutius, and say, that he taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium took his name of Saturne, because he did latere, that is, he hiddden there, when he fled from Jupiter, is questionable, a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanity to think that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fled from another ; so in the truth of History, it is well known, that no king reigning in those parts was so mighty, that it should be hard to find one Country or another, wherein a man might be safe from his pursuit : And yet, as most fables and poetical fictions were occasioned by some ancient truth, which either by ambiguity of speech, or some allusion, they did mainly and darkly express (for so they signified a passage over a River in Hell) because death is a passage to another life, and because this passage is hateful, lamentable, and painful, therefore they named the River Styx, of hate ; Cocytus of lamentation, and Acheron, of pain : so also because men are stonie hearted ; and because the Greek Λαοί, people, and Λαῖς, stones, are near in sound, therefore they feigned in the time of Dionysius, stones converted into men, as at other times men into stones : in like manner it may be, that the original of Saturnus hiding himself, was some allusion to that old opinion of the wisest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Alti : whence also Eloj of the true God says, 129.46.

Deus abscondit. For it cannot be in vain, that the word Saturnus should also have this very significacion, if it be derived (as some think) from the Hebrew Satur, which is to hide : Howbeit I deny not but that the original of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought else where.

Reyneccius doth conjecture that the Ceteans, who descended of Cetibus, the son of Javan, were the men who gave the name to Latium. For these Ceteans, are remembered by Homer as aiders of the Trojans in their war. Strabo, interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crown of Troy. Hecupion Reyneccius gathers, that their abode was in Asia : viz. in agro Elaitico, in the Elaitian Territory, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a City, which the Ætolians held in Asia, called Elas or Elais, Pausanias makes mention : Stephanus calls it Cydemia, or (according to the Greek writing) Cidamia, which name last retained, hath a very near found to Cebim, Citim, or Cibim, the Greek Letter (D) having (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (T) differing only in the strength or weakness of utterance, which is found between many English words, written with the same letters. Wherefore that the Ceteans, the son of Javan, descended of Cetibus, Citim, or Kitim, the son of Javan, who was Progenitor of the Greeks, might very well take a denomination from the City, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called E-laites, or Elaites, it is very likely, considering that among the Aræadians, Phocians, Ætolians, and Elaians, who all were of the Æolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountain Eleus, the Haven Elas, the people Elaites, the City Elasus, Elais, and Elaitis, of which last, it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name than Elaitis, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cetei and Aræadians had their original from Cetibus, it is nothing unlikely, that agreeing in language and similitude of names, they might nevertheless differ in found and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (ceiving the Sabinus from him) give the name of Sabinus : in the like manner he whom the Aræadians would call Elatus (of which name they had a Prince that founded the City Elaitis) be named of the Ceteans Latius. Reyneccius, pursuing this likelihood, thinks that when Euripylus, Lord of the Ceteans, (being the son of Telephus, whom Hercules begat upon Ange, the daughter of Ateneus King of Arcadia) was slain by Achilles in the Trojan War : then did Telephus brother to Euripylus, conduct the Ceteans, who (fearing what evil might befall themselves by the Greeks, if the affairs of Troy should go ill) passed into that part of Italy, whereas the Aræadians were planted by Oenotrius. And Reyneccius farther thinks, that Telephus, being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Aræadians, by the memory of his Grand-mother Ange, an Aræadian Lady, was well contented to take an Aræadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elaitius, and then Latius. That this name of Elatus may have been taken or imposed by the Aræadians, it is the more easy to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Iphidius, the other of Elatus, who were sons of Aræus King of Arcadia, which gave name unto the Country : and between these two families the succession in that Kingdom did pass, almost interchangeably, for many ages, till at the end of the Trojan War it fell into the hand of Hippobolus of the race of Elatus, in whose Posterity it continued until the last. Again the name of Latius, having a derivative found, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the conjecture of Reyneccius, which if he made over-boldly, yet others may follow it with the less reproof, considering that it is not easy to find either an apparent truth, or fair probability among these disagreeing Authors, which have written the originals of Latium.

SECT. VI.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines until Æneas his coming.

THE Kings which reigned in Latium before the arrival of Æneas, were Saturnus Picus, Faunus, & Latius. Of Saturne there is nothing remembered, save what is mentioned already, and many Fables of the Greeks, which whether they be applicable to this man, it is for him to judge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturnus of the Greeks called by them Κρόνος, or some other, killed Saturne by the Aborigines. For the age wherein he lived, may very well admit him to have been the same : but the names of Stereus, and Stercutinus (for it may be, this name was not borrowed from the skill which he taught the people, but rather the foil which they laid on their grounds had that appellation from him) do rather make him seem some other man.

Of Picus it is said that he was a good horse-man. The fable of this being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pye, may well seem (as it is interpreted) to have grown from the skill which he had in fowling, or divination, by the flight and chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the son of Picus, reigned after his Father : He gave to Evander the Aræadian (who having slain by mischance his father Echeneus King of Arcadia, fled into Italy) the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Fatus, the sister of Faunus, who was also his wife, as all Historians agree, the was held a Prophetess and highly commended for her clarity, which praise in her must needs have been much blestified by her marriage, it self being merely ineffable.

It is not mentioned that Faunus, had by his sister any child, neither do we read of any other Wife which he had, save that Virgil gives unto him Latius as his son, by a Nymph called Marica.

But who this Marica was, it is not found, save only that her abode was about the River Liris near Monturone.

Of the name Latius, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted four : one, the Son of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Ulysses by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice only of the second, of whom he saith, that his name was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Cetei were from his surname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reyneccius, the difference consisting almost in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus the son of Hercules, whereas Reyneccius makes him his Nephew, by a son of the same name. This Latius having obtained the succession in the Kingdom after Faunus, did promise his only Daughter and Heir Lavinia, to Turnus the Son of Venilia, who was sister to Amata, Latius his Wife.

But when Æneas arrived in those parts with fifteen ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be embarked, according to the rate which Trojan did allow to the Vessels then used, about one thousand and two hundred men : then Latius finding that it would stand best with his assurance, to make alliance with the Trojans, and moved with the great reputation of Æneas, which himself had heard of in the war of Troy, gave his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus : who incensed herewith, fought to avenge himself by war : which was soon ended with his own death.

Of Amata the wife of Latius, it is very certain, that were she an Italian, she could not have born a Daughter marriageable at the arrival of Æneas : unless we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Cetei into Italy, to Telephus the father, than to his Son, who served in the last year of the Trojan War. But Reyneccius holds her an Asiatique, and thinks withall, that Lavinia was born before Telephus came into Italy. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Haliscarnassus call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seem by Varro, who calleth her Palatinus : which name very well might be derived from the Greek name Παλας, Amata, which signifieth beloved, or dear, was the name by which the High Priest called every Virgin whom he took to serve as a Nun of Vesta : wherefore it is the more easy to be thought a surname, howsoever Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her sister.

Lavinia, the Daughter of Latius, being given in marriage to Æneas, the Kingdom of Latium, or the greatest part of that Country, was established in that race : wherein it continued until it was overgrown by the might and greatness of the Romans.

SECT. IV.

Of Aeneas, and of the Kings and Governors of Alba.

AENEAS himself being of the Royal blood of Troy, was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Trojans. By his Wife Creusa, the Daughter of Priamus, he had a Son called Ascanius, whose surname was Julus, having before the ruin of Troy (as Virgil notes) been furnished Ilius. But when Aeneas was dead, his Wife Lavinia, the Daughter of Latinus, being gifted with child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was delivered of a Son, called thereupon Sylvius, and furnished Posthumus, because he was born after his Father's Funeral. This light of Lavinia was so evil taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her return, entreated her honourably, and using her as a Queen, did foster her young Son, his half brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards whether to avoid all occasions of disgracement, or enlightened with the situation of the place, Ascanius leaving to his Mother in law the City Lavinium, which Aeneas had built and called after his new Wife's name, founded the City Alba Longa and therein reigned. The time of his reign was, according to some, eight and twenty years: Virgil gives him thirty, others five and thirty, and eight and thirty. After his decease, there arose a contention between Sylvius, the son of Aeneas, and Julus the son of Ascanius, about the Kingdom: but the people inclining to the Son of Lavinia, Julus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leaving the Kingdom to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posterity were afterwards called Sylvii.

The reign of the Alban Kings, with the continuance of each mans reign, I find thus set down:

1	Sylvius Posthumus .	29
2	Sylvius Aeneas .	31
3	Sylvius Latinus .	50
4	Sylvius Alba .	39
5	Sylvius Atus .	26
6	Sylvius Capys .	28
7	Sylvius Capys .	13
8	Sylvius Tiberinus .	8
9	Sylvius Ascapia .	48
10	Sylvius Aladus .	39
11	Sylvius Aventinus .	17
12	Sylvius Procas .	23
13	Sylvius Amulius .	44
	Sylvius Amulius .
	Alia , called also Rhea and Sylvia .
	Romulus Remus .

The most of these Kings lived in peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus, founded many Towns in the borders of Latio: one standing much upon the honour of their original, grew thereby to be called Prose Latinia. Of Tiberinus some think, that the River Tiber had name, being formerly called Albia: but Virgil gives it that denomination of another called Tiberis: before the coming of Aeneas into Italy. The Mountain Aventinus had name (as many write) from Aventinus King of the Alban, who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Julus the brother of Aventinus, is named by Ensebius as father of another Julus, and grandfather of Julus Proculus, who leaving Alba, dwelt with Remus in Rome: Numerius, the elder Son of Procas, was deprived of his Kingdom by his brother Amulius, by whom also his Son Agellus was slain, and Alia his daughter made a Nun of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numerius might be cut off. But the conceived two Sons, either by her Uncle Amulius, as some think, or by Mars, as the Poets kings, or perhaps by some man of war. Both the children their Uncle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quick according to the law, which so ordained, when the Vestal Virgins brake their chastity. Whether it was so, that the mother was pardoned at the entreaty of Amulius, the Daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein do vary) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preserved, who afterwards revenged the cruelty of their Uncle, with the slaughter of him and all his, and restored Numerius their Grandfather to the Kingdom: where in how long he reigned, I find not, neither is it greatly material to know: for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latinum were presently eclipsed by the swift increase of Rome: upon which the computation of Time following (as far as concerns the things of Italy) is dependant. After the death of Numerius, the Kingdom of Alba ceased; for Numerius left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to live in Rome, and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albani were governed by Magistrates: of whom only two Dictators are mentioned, namely Cainus Clivilius, who in the days of Tullius Hostilius, King of the Romans, making War upon Rome, dyed in the Camp; and Metius Sufferius, the successor of Clivilius, who surrendered the Estate of Alba unto the Romans, having committed the hazard of both Seigniories to the success of three men of each side, who decided the quarrel by Combat: in which, the three brethren Horatii, the Champions of the Romans, prevailed against the Curatii, Champions of the Albani. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullius Hostilius with the Albani forces against the Vestres and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battle, hoping thereby to leave the Romans to such an overthrow, as might make them weak enough for the Albani to deal with; Tullius, who notwithstanding this falsehood, obtained the victory, did reward Metius with a cruel death, causing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torn in pieces. Then was Alba destroyed, and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patricians; among which were the Julii: of whom C. Julius Caesar being descended, not only gloried in his ancient, royal, and forgotten pedigree, in full assembly of the Romans, then governed by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industry, valour, and judgment, obtained the Sovereignty of the Roman Empire (much by him enlarged) to himself and his posterity; whereby the name of Aeneas, and honour of the Trojan and Alban Race, was so revived, that seldom, if ever, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of glory.

SECT.

SECT. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus his Birth and Death.

OF Rome, which devoured the Alban Kingdom, I may here tell thee the beginnings, which (though somewhat uncertain) depend much upon the birth and education of Romulus, the Grand-child of Numerius, the last that reigned in Alba. For how not only the bordering people, but all Nations between Euphrates and the Ocean, were broken in pieces by the iron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to be described in one place, having been the work of many ages: whereof I now do handle only the first, as incident unto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Portius Catto, Calpurnius Piso, Sempronius, and others, seek to derive the Romans from Tanus: but Herodotus, Merops, and many others of equal credit, give the Grecians for their Ancestors: and as Strabo reporteth in his fifth Book, Cælius rerum Romanarum Scriptor, ex argumento colligit, Romanæ Grecis esse conditam, quod Romani Greci ritu, antiquo instituto, Herculi rem sacram faciunt: matrem quique Evandri venerantur Romani: Cælius (saith he) a Roman Historiographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greeks, because the Romans, after Greekish fashion, by ancient ordinance, do sacrifice to Hercules, the Romans also worship the Mother of Evander.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembereth many Founders of that City: as Numa the Son of Tanus: Diomedes (not that from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latinians, who drove the Trojans out of that Country, built it. Sabinus follows the honour of building Rome upon Evander, saying, That it was beforetimes called Valentia. Heraclides gives the denomination to a captive Lady, brought thither by the Grecians: others say, That it was anciently called Febris, after the name of Februa, the Mother of Mars; witness S. Augustine in his third Book de Civitate Dei. But Livie will have it to be the work of Romulus, even from the foundation: of whom and his comfort, Tullius as a Roman Citizen, vaunting of their original, answered in these Verses:

Atamen tu longe repetas longeque revolvos,
Majorum quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
Aut pater fuit, aut illud quod diceret no.

Yet though thou fetch thy pedigree for far:
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepherd was, or else, that I'll forbear.
meaning, either a Shepherd or a Thief.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preservation, it is said, That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars supposed to be his father: that he was nursed by a Wolf, found and taken away by Faustula, a Shepherds Wife. The same unnatural nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But as Plutarch saith, it is like enough that Amulius came covered with armour to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child: and therefore it is seemeth to me that he might have two purposes: the one to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heir of his elder brother, from whom he injuriously held the Kingdom: the other, to satiate his appetite, because she was fair and goodly. For the being made a Nun of the goddess Vesta, it was death in her, by the law, to break her chastity. I also find in Ensebius his Antiquities of Gauls, that Meretrix, the King of the Franks, was begotten by a Monkish of the Isle: but Faustus saith, Let them believe it that list. Il le crerra qui vaudra: Allo of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poetical inventions: But to answer these imaginations in general, It is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many gods as there were Kings, or passions of the mind, or as there were of vices and virtues, then did many women greatly born, cover flesh slips as they made, by prostituting to be forced by more than humane power: so did Oenone consents to Paris, that she had been ravished by Apollon, And Anchises boasted that he had known Venus. But Rhea was made with child by some man of War, or other, and therefore called Mars, the god of battle, according to the fate of the time. Oenone was overcome by a strong wit, and by such a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollon. The Mother of Meretrix might fancy a Sea-Captain, to be gotten with young by such a one: as the Daughter of Isachos fancied, according to Herodotus, Aeneas was a bastard, and begotten upon some fair Harlot, called for her beauty Venus. And was therefore the Child of Lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nursed by a Wolf, which was Lupa, or Lupina; for the Curfews in those days were called Wolfs, Que nunc (saith Halicarnassensis) honestior vocabulo esse applicatur, quod nunc per unum nomine habet frons.

It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken up into heaven, or rather out of the world, by his father Mars, in a great storm of thunder and lightning: so it was said that Aeneas vanished away by the River Nimicus: but thereof Livie speaketh modestly; for he rehearseth the other opinion that the storm was the fury of the Senators, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking up; and many Authors agree, that there was an unnatural darkness, both at his birth, and at his death; and that he might be slain by thunder or lightning, it is not unlikely. For the Emperor Augustus was slain with lightning: so was Strabo the Father of Pompey slain with a thunderbolt: so Carus the Emperor (who succeeded Probus) whilst he lodged with his Army upon the River Tybris, was there slain with lightning. But a Mars of the same kind might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of War, and by violence destroyed. And that he died by violence (which destiny followed most of the Roman Emperors) it appeareth by Turquinius Superbus, who was the seventh King after him: who when he had murdered his Father-in-law, commanded that he should not be buried, for (saith he) Romulus himself died and was not buried. But let Halicarnassensis end this dispute; whose words are these:

They (saith he) who dream nearst to the truth, say that he was slain by his own Citizens; and that his crucities in punishment of offenders, together with his arrogance, were the cause of his slaunder. For it is reported, that both when his mother was ravished, whether by some man, or by a god, the whole body of the Sun was eclipsed, and all the earth covered with darkness like unto night, and that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historieth by Plutarch, doth contain (besides what is here already spoken of him) the conquest of a few miles, which had soon been forgotten, if the Roman greatness built upon that foundation, had not given it memory in all ages following, even unto this day. A valiant man he was, very strong of body, patient of travel, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the use of wine and delicacies: but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his brother, and neglect to revenge the death of Tatius, his companion in the Kingdom, that he himself might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He reigned 37 years, first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death, single, till he was slain, as is already shewed: after which time, the Sovereignty fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him unknown, and more Priest-like than King: like wherein Rome it self in her latter times hath somewhat resembled this King. For having long been sole Governours, till Constance shared with her: afterwards, when as the Greek Emperours was crushed by foreign enemies, and the Latines dispossessed of Imperial power, she fell into the subjection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheep-hook to the Sword, and therewith victorious to excessive magnificence, from whence by the same degrees it fell, being driven from luxury to defensive arms, and therein having been unfortunate, at length betakes herself again to the Crozier staff.

And thus much of Rome in this place, by occasion of the story of the times of King Abaz, during whose reign in Jury, the foundations of this famous City were laid.

CHAP. XXV.

Of EZECHIA, and his Contemporaries.

SECT. I.

Of the beginning of Ezechias, and of the agreeing of Ptolomy, Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, and Mardocempadus, with the History of the Bible.

AS the first year of Abaz his reign was consounded with the last of his father Jaham, so was the latter end of his sixteen years taken up in the three first of Ezechias, his son.

This appears by the Reign of Hofia, over Israel, which began in the twelfth of Abaz, and therefore, the third thereof was concurrent with Abaz, his fourteenth. But the third of Hofia, was the first of Ezechias: so it follows, that Ezechias began to reign in his Fathers fourteenth year. Like enough it is, that the third year of Hofia, the same being the fourteenth of Abaz, was almost spent when Ezechias began, and so the fifteenth year of Abaz may have been concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezechias.

By supposing that Hofia began his Kingdom, when the twelfth year of Abaz was almost compleat, some would find the means how to dis-join the first of Ezechias from the thirteenth of Abaz, placing him yet one year later, of which year, Abaz may perhaps have lived not many days. But seeing that the fourteenth and fifteenth years of Ezechias may not be removed out of their places, it is vain labour to alter the first year.

In the fourteenth year of Ezechias, Senacherib, invaded Juda and the Countries adjoining, lost his Army by a miraculous stroke from Heaven, fled home, and was slain.

The year following it was that God added sixteen years to the life of Ezechias, when he had already reigned fourteen of his nine and twenty, and the time year was that miracle seen of the Suns going back: of which wonder (as I hear) one Bartholomew Scutiger, who is much commended for skill in Astronomy, hath by calculation found the very day, which answered to the twenty fifth of April, in the Julian year, being then Thursday. I have not seen any works of Scutiger, but surely find a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessary that he produce some Record of observation made at such a time. Howsoever it be, the fifteenth year of Ezechias agreed upon: and therefore we may not alter the first. As for that saying, which is used in like cases, that Abaz slept with his fathers, and Ezechias his son reigned in his stead, it doth no more prove that Ezechias reigned not with his Father, than the like saying doth infer the like at the death of Jehoshaphat, and succession of Jehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Son to reign whilst his Father lived, we have already said enough.

Of this godly King Ezechias, we find, that his very beginning testified his devotion and zeal. For whether it were so, that his unfortunate and ungracious Father (who had outworn his reputation) lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather think) the first year and first month of his reign, wherein Ezechias opened the doors of the Temple, were to be understood as the beginning of his sole government; we plainly find it to have been his first work, that he opened the doors of the house of the Lord, which Abaz had shut up, cleansed the City and Kingdom of the Idols, restored the Priests to their offices and estates, commanded the Sacrifices to be offered which had been for many years neglected, and brake down the brazen serpent of Moses, because the people burnt incense before it, and he called it Nebuchadnezar, which signifies a lump of brass. He did also celebrate the pass-over with great magnificence, inviting thereto the Israelites of other Tribes. Many there were, even out of those Tribes, that came up to Jerusalem, to this feast: But the general multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezechias to scorn.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memorial of their deliverance out of the Egyptian servitude, fell into a new servitude; out of which they never were delivered. For in the fourth of Ezechias his reign, Salmannassar the Son of Tiglat, the Son of Belachus, hearing that Hofia King of Israel had practised with So King of Egypt, against him, invaded Israel, besieged Samaritis, and in the third year

(after the inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Assyria and Media: among whom Tobias and his Son of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Nineve: in whose seats and places the Assyrians sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient enemies of the Israelites, as those of Cutha, Awa, Hamah, and Seperanath, besides Babylonians; whose Places and Nations I have formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

The latter Assyrian Kings, and the Perfians, which followed them, are the first of whom we find mention made both in Prophane and Sacred books. These therefore serve aptly to join the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets have written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better known, and described in course of History. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Perfians, we find in the Bible the same names by which other Authors have recorded them: but of Phid and Salmannassar, with other Assyrians, Chaldean Kings, diversities of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures do speak of Salmannassar, King of Assyria, who reigned in the time of Abaz and Ezechias, Kings of Juda, and of Hofia King of Israel, whom he carried into captivity: and whereas Ptolomy makes mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he lived; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmannassar and Nabonassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requireth, that it be shewed of Nebuchadnezzar, that he was the same whom Ptolomy calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Bucholerus hath well collected sufficient proof from the exact calculations of sundry good Mathematicians. For by them it appears, that between Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seven hundred forty and six years: at which distance of time the reign of Salmannassar was. One great proof hereof is this, which the same Bucholerus allegeth out of Erasmus Reinholdus, in the Prutenick Tables. Mardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolomy, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moon, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Meredach, who sent Embassadors to Ezechias King of Juda. So that if we reckon backward to the difference of time between Meredach and Salmannassar, we shall find it the same which is between Mardocempadus and Nabonassar. Likewise Fundinus doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samaritis, to the destruction of Jerusalem, in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirty and three years: the self same distance of time is found in Ptolomy, between Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For whereas Ptolomy is to suffer from this account, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and forty years, than the destruction of Jerusalem, we are to understand that he took Samaritis in the eighth year of his reign: so that the seven foregoing years added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the account of the Scriptures to fall even with that of Ptolomy. Ptolomy's computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar, to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed a hundred twenty seven years. Now if we add to these one hundred twenty seven, the thirteen ensuing of Nebuchadnezzar's years, before the City and Temple were destroyed, we have the sum of one hundred and forty years. To plain a case more proofless are needless, though many are brought, of which this may serve for all, that Ptolomy placeeth the first of Nabopolassar, one hundred twenty and two years after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the content of all Mathematicians: which in account of times I hold more sure than the authority of any History; and therefore I think it folly to make doubt; whereas Historians and Mathematical observations do so thoroughly concur.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scutiger doth not seem unanswer'd, whereby he proved Badadan the Father of Meredach, to have been the Nabonassar, I will not spare to lose a word or two in giving the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next observations of the heavenly Bodies, which Ptolomy recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the reign of Mardocempadus; the second year of whose reign is, according to Ptolomy, concurrent in part with the twenty seven of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which he calculates, being in the second year of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twenty seven years, seventeen days, and eleven hours: the account from Nabonassar, beginning at high-noon the first day of the Egyptian Month Thoth, then answering to the twenty sixth of February; and this Eclipse being fifty minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Month, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February: so that the difference of time between the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolomy, according to the Egyptian years. But how doth this prove that Mardocempadus or Meredach, was the Son of Nabonassar? yes, how doth it prove, that he was his next successor, or any way of his lineage? it was enough to falsifie me, in this argument, that Scutiger himself did afterwards believe Mardocempadus to have been rather the Nephew than the Son of Badadan, or Nabonassar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Son; he might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countryman Lydius hath reprehended Scutiger for changing his opinion; and that both Tornelius, who follows Scutiger herein, and Sethus Calvisius, who hath drawn into form of Chronology, that learned work, De Emendatione Temporum, to hold up the same assertion, confounding Badadan with Nabonassar, I have taken the pains to search, as far as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might prove the Kindred or Succession of these two. Yet cannot I find in the Almagest (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or adverse to Scutiger; and other good authority, I know none, in this business) any sentence more nearly proving the succession of Meredach to Nabonassar, than the place now last rehearsed: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was father to the other, than (that I may use a like example) the as near succession of William the Conqueror, declares him, to have been Son, or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, we may safely go on with our account from Nabonassar, taking him from Salmannassar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driven from our Book, when they find something in it, agreeing with Annius, forasmuch as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Babylon and Assyria, in those very times which by Diadorus and Ptolomy are assigned to Belsus, Nabonassar, and Mardocempadus, and the rest: no good History naming any others that reigned there in those ages; and all Astronomical observations, fitly concurring with the years that are attributed to these, or numbered from them.

SECT. IV.

Of the Kings that were in Media during the Reign of Ezechia: of the difference found between sundry Authors in rehearsing the Median Kings. Other Contemporaries of Ezechia. Of Candaules, Gyges, and the Kings descended from Hercules.

IN the time of Ezechia, Medius, and after him Cardicus, reigned in Media. Whether it were so, that variety of Names, by which these Kings were called in several Histories, hath caused them to seem more than indeed they were; or whether the Sons reigning with the Fathers, have caused not only the names of Kings, but the length of Time wherein they governed Media, to exceed the due proportion, or whether the Copies themselves of Crisis and Annius with Metasthenes, have been faulty, as neither of these two Authors is over-highly commended of trustfulness; so it is that the names, number, and length of reign are all very diversly reported of these Median Kings, that follow Arbaces: therefore it need not seem strange, that I reckon Medius and Cardicus as Contemporaries with Ezechia. For to reconcile to great a difference, as is found in those Writers that vary from Eusebius, is more than I dare undertake. I will only here set down the Roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as sundry Authors have delivered it. Annius his Metasthenes orders them and their reigns thus.

Mercator hath laboured, with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them agree with Eusebius. But forasmuch as it seems to me an impossible matter, to attain unto the truth of his forgotten times, by conjectures founded upon Ctesias and Metasthenes, I will lay the burden upon Eusebius, who lived in an age better furnished than ours, with Books of this Argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I have reckoned as contemporaries with Ezechia) Medius and Cardi- cus, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardicus were Diodorus his Arbaces, I will not fail to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, reigned in this order.

Cardicus	15
Deices	54
Phraortes	24
Cyaxares	22
Alyages	38

These names, and this course of Succession I retain, but add unto these, Cyaxares, the son of Alyages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Herodotus, in setting down the length of a Kings reign, otherwise than Eusebius hath it, of which variations I will render my reasons in due place.

The twenty nine years of Ezechia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the four first that were chosen Governors of Achur for ten years, that is, of Charpi, Asmedes, Eldicus, and Hippocres. Touching the first of these I hear nothing, save that Rome was built in his first year; of which perhaps himself did not hear. Of the second and third I find only the Names. The fourth made himself known by a strange example of justice, or rather of cruelty, that he shewed upon his own Daughter. For he finding that she had offended in unchastity, caused her to be locked up with an Horse, giving to neither of them any food: so the Horse, constrained by hunger devoured the unhappy Woman.

In Rome, the first King, and Founder of that City was Romulus, he reigned both before and somewhat after Ezechias.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King ruled in the same age.

This Region was first called Meonia. Lydius, the son of Atrus reigning in it, gave the name of Lydia, if we believe such authority as we find.

This Kingdom was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle conferred upon Argos, who came of Aleus the son of Hercules by Jardana a bond-woman.

The race of these Heiracidae continued reigning fifty five years (in which two and twenty Generations passed) the Son continually succeeding the Father. Candaules the son of Myrsus was the last of his race, who doated too much upon the beauty of his own Wife, that he could not be content to enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges the son of Dasytus to behold her naked body, and placed the unwilling man secretly in her chamber, where he might feel her preparing to bedward. This was not so closely carried, but that the Queen perceived Gyges at his going forth and understanding the matter, took it to such high disdain, that she forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with treason. So Gyges being brought again into the same Chamber by the Queen, slew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife but with the Kingdom of Lydia. He reigned thirty eight years, beginning in the last of Ezechias, one year before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his son Ardys, reigned nine and forty years; then Sadyates twelve; Halyarnas, fifty seven; and finally Cresus the son of Athyarnas fourteen years: who lost the Kingdom, and was taken by Cyrus of Perfia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings whom Ctesias his Progenitor disposeth, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there there sprang many other Kings, which governed several Countries very long; as in Asia, the Myrsians, in Greece, the Lacedaemonians, Messenians, Rodians, Corinthians and Argives; and from the Argives, the Macedonians, as likewise from the Corinthians, the Syracensians: besides many great and famous, though private families. But of the Heraclidae that reigned in Lydia, I have not troubled myself to take notice of the time of their several reigns: for little is found of them besides the bare names, and the folly of this last King Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, between the deliverance of Israel from thence, and the reign of Ezechia in Juda when Egypt and Juda made a League against the Assyrians.

SECT. I.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in History, are like to have belonged only to Fictions. An Example proving this out of William of Tyre his History of the Holy War.

THE emulation and quarrels arising in these times between the mighty Kingdoms of Egypt and Assyria, do require our pains, in collecting the most memorable things in Egypt, and setting down briefly the state of that Country, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the Maltrey.

Of Cham the son of Noah, who first planted that Country, and of Osiris, Orus and other ancient Kings that reigned there, until the Israelites were thence delivered, more hath been said already than I can stand too: Though I hold it no shame to fall in such Conjectures. That which I have delivered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must here again help me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to have reigned in Egypt, were none other than Vice-roys or Stewards, such as Josaph was, and such as were the Souldans in later ages. Therefore I will not only forbear to seek after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus have reckoned up, from the mouths of Egyptian Priests, delivering them by number, without rehearsing their Names; but will save the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names only are found; the years of their reigns, and other circumstances proving them to have been Kings indeed, being not recorded.

But that I may not seem before hand to lay an imaginary ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amiss, to give unto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of History doth afford: First therefore, we ought not to believe those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests have reckoned up, to magnify their Antiquities. For we know that from Abraham, our Saviour Christ was removed only forty two descents; which makes it evident, that in far shorter time, namely before the Perfian Empire, there could not have passed away twice as many successions in Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, having reigned longer than forty years. It follows that we should square the number of the Egyptian Kings in some even proportion, to those which did bear rule in other Countries. As for the rest whose names we find scattered here and there; any man that will take the pains to read the 19th Book of the Holy War, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily persuade himself, that it is not hard to find names enough, of such as might be thought to have reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroys. Yet will I here insert as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose, for the pleasure and information of such as will not trouble themselves with turning over many Authors.

When Eladab the Caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan a powerful and a subtle man, made himself Souldan, by force and cunning, chasing away Samar an Arabian, who was Souldan before and after him. This Dargan ministered matter of quarrel to Amalrick King of Jerusalem, and sustained, with little loss, an invasion, which Amalrick made upon Egypt. Whereupon he grew so insolent and proud, that Samar the former Souldan hoped to make his party good against him, if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Egypt. Briefly, Samar such to Nuradun, King of Damascus, for aye, who sends an Army of his Turks, under the command of Ysaac, against the Souldan Dargan. So Dargan and Samar met, and fought: The Victory was Dargan's; but he enjoyed it not: For in few days after he was slain by treason, whereby Samar did recover his dignity: which to establish, he slew all the kindred and friends of Dargan, that he he could find in the great City of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Eladab gave little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them lived, and had the administration of the Kingdom, whilst he might have the profit of it and his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would think) do nearly touch the Caliph himself. Saracen with his Turks, whom Samar had gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be in treated there to leave him, and quietly go their way home. They seize upon the Town of Belbeis, which they fortify, and there attend the arrival of more company from Damascus for the conquest of all Egypt. The Souldan perceives their intent, and finds himself not strong enough to expell them, much less to expell the Turkish Army that was likely to second them: He therefore sends Messengers to King Amalrick of Jerusalem, whom with large promises he gets to bring him ayde, and so drives out the Turks: Of all this trouble the great Caliph hears nothings; or not so much as should make him look to the playing of his own game.

A greater mischief arieth, concerning the Caliph Elbadach particularly in his own Title. Syracusa Captain of the Turks that had been in Egypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was opposite to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as heir to Mahomet that false Prophet, the Sovereignty over all that were of the Saracen Law) and tells him the weakness of the Egyptian, with his own ability of doing service in those parts; offering his best means for the extirpation of the Schismatical Caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, with the Western parts, under the subjection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Eastern Provinces are up in Arms and Syracusa, with a mighty power, descends into Egypt. The noise of this great expedition so affrighteth King Almarick, that with all his forces he halts into Egypt, well knowing how nearly it concerned him and his Kingdom of Jerusalem, to keep the Saracens from joining all under one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiving the faithful care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and betters himself in giving them all manner of content, as it behoved him; for by their admirable valour, he finally drove the enemies out of the Country. But this victory was not so soon gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concerns our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seems to know nothing. May we not think that he has been King in Title only, who meddled so little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose help all was lost) could not well stay so long as his necessities required, makes large offers to King Almarick, upon condition that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tithe (which William of Tyre calls it a Tribute) the Saracens perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Jerusalem should receive out of Egypt, for this behovely assistance. But the Christians understanding that the Soldan (how much sower he took upon him) was subject to a higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance with any other than the Caliph himself. Hereupon Hugh the Earl of Caesarea, and a Knight of the Temple, are sent up to Elbadach to ratify the covenants. Now shall we leave the greatness of the Caliph and his estate.

These Embassadours were conveyed by the Soldan to Cairo, where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great Troops of Soldiers. The first entrance was through dark Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Ethiopian, which with all diligence did reverence to the Soldan as he passed along. Through these frightful Wardens led them into goodly open Courts, of such beauty and riches, that they could not retain the gravity of Embassadours, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they saw goodly Marble Pillars, gilded Beams, all wrought over with Embroid Work, curious Pavements, Fountains of Marble with clear Waters, and many sorts of strange Birds, unknown in those parts of the World, as coming perhaps from the East Indies, which then was undiscovered. The further they went, the greater was their magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuchs conveyed them into other Courts within these, as far exceeding the former, as the former did surpass ordinary houses. It was tedious perhaps to rehearse how the further they entered, the more high state they found, and cause of marvel; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was never held a vain Author. Finally they were brought into the Caliph's own lodgings, which were yet more stately and better guarded; where entering the Presence, the Soldan having twice proffered himself, did the third time cast off his sword, that he wore about his neck, and throw himself on the ground before the Curtain, behind which the Caliph sat. Presently the traveller wrought with Gold and Pearls was opened, and the Caliph himself discovered, sitting with great Majesty on a Throne of Gold, having few of his most inward Servants and Eunuchs about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his coming, the danger wherein the Land stood, and the offers that he made unto King Almarick, desiring the Caliph himself to ratify them in the presence of the Embassadours. The Caliph answered, That he would thoroughly perform all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadours: They would have him to give his hand upon the bargain; which the Egyptian that stood by thought an impudent request. Yet his greatness condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan to reach out his hand. When the Earl of Caesarea saw that the Caliph gave his hand neither willingly nor bare, he told them roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth seeks no holes to hide; it tells Princes that will hold Covenant, must deal openly, nakedly, and sincerely: Give us therefore your bare hand, if you mean that we shall trust you, for we will make no bargain with your Glove. Much ado there was about this: for it seemed against the Majesty of such a Prince to yield so far. But when it would none otherwise be, with a smiling cheer (though to the great grief of his Servants) he vouchsafed to let the Earl take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the covenants word by word, as the Earl spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadours with such rewards as testified his greatness.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, we may discern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himself with the great preparations made against him which terrify the neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the mean season, using all Royall power, making War and Peace, entertaining and repelling Armies of strangers; yea, making the Land of Egypt tributary to a foreign Prince. What greater authority was given to Joseph, when Pharaoh said unto him, Thou shalt be over mine house, and all thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the Kings throne will I be above thee. Behold I have fed thee over all the Land of Egypt.

I do not commend this form of government; neither can I approve the conjuncture of mine Author, where he thinks that the Egyptians, ever since Joseph's time, have felt the burden of that servitude which he brought upon them. When he thought them and their Lands for Pharaoh. Herein I find no judgment good: that he affirms this manner of the Egyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customs prescribed by the Pharaohs. For we find, that even the Ptolemies (excepting Ptolemæus Lagi, and his son Philadelphus, Founder and establisher of that race) were given, all of them wholly, to please their own appetites, leaving the charge of the Kingdom to Women, Eunuchs, and other Ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Country afforded, were indeed sufficient to invite the Kings thereof unto a voluptuous ous life, and the awful regard wherein the Egyptian held their Princes, gave them security, whereby they might the better trust their Officers with so ample commision. But of this matter, I will not stand any longer to dispute. It is enough to have thieved, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroy governing Egypt, is let down by Moser, and that a lively example of the same is found in William of Tyre, who lived in the same age, was in few years after Chancellor of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, and had full discourse with Hugh Earl of Caesarea touching all these matters. Wherefore it remains that we be not carried away with a vain opinion, to believe that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians have honoured with that title; but rest content with a Catalogue of such, as we find by circumstance, likely to have reigned in that Country; after whom it follows that we should make inquiry.

SECT. II.

Of Acherres; whether he were Uchoreus that was the eighth from Osymandyas. Of Osymandyas and his Tomb.

IN this business I hold it vain to be too curious. For I who can hope to attain to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodore varies from Herodotus, Eusebius from both of them; and late Writers that have sought to gather the truth out of these and others, find no one with whom they can agree? In this case Amius would do good service, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding to him when others do either say nothing, or that which may justly be suspected. I will therefore follow my self content with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Isis, Orus, and those antiquities removed so far out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Egypt, it shall suffice that Herodotus, Diodore, and Eusebius have not been silent, and that Reynecius hath taken pains to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or else found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Egypt, unto the reign of Thoris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greek call Protesus) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I set down the fame which are found in Eusebius, and give to every one the same length of reign.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded unto Chacres, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seems to Reynecius to be the same whom Diodore calls Uchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But where as mention is found in Diodore of a great King named Osymandyas, from whom Uchoreus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timarus (as Reynecius conjectures) was the great Osymandyas; or else that this Acherres was Uchoreus: for the distance between them was more than eight generations.

Mercator judgeth Osymandyas to have been the husband of Acherres, Orus the second daughter; thinking that Mansuet (cited by J. Josephus) doth omit his name, and insert his Wives into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his Wives right. As for Uchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to find him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdoas, not to signify in this place of Diodore (as that Greek word elf doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging also to Uchoreus, who might have had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vex my braines in the unprofitable use of this, and the like inextinguishable doubt.

All that Diodore hath found of this Osymandyas, was wrought upon his monument, the most thereof in figures, which I think the Egyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was portrayed a great Army, with the siege of a Town, the captivity of the people, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this the Egyptians said to denote the conquest of Babylonia made by that King; which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly piece of work which Diodore so particularly describes, to have been erected for a common place of buriall to the ancient Kings and Queens of Egypt, and to their Viceroyes; whilst yet they were not so ambitious, as every one to have his own particular monument, differing therein to exceed all others. This appears by the many statues therein placed, by the Wars, the judgment seat, the receiving of tribute, the offering sacrifice to God, the account of revenues, and plenty of cattle and food: all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the several Offices of a Governor. On the Tomb of Osymandyas was this Inscription.

I am Osymandyas King of Kings; if any desire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceed some of my work.

Let them that hope to exceed his works, labour to know what he was. But since by those words, O where I lie, it should seem, that he lay not there interred, we may lawfully suspect that he was Joseph, whose bodie was preserved among the Hebrews, to be buried in the land of Canaan, and this on my monument might King Orus, who outlived him, erect in honour of his high deserts, among the royal sepulchres. To which purpose the plenty of cattle and all manner of Viands, had good reference. The name of Osymandyas doth not hinder this conjecture; seeing Joseph had one new name given him by Pharaoh, for the expounding the dream, and might, upon further occasions, have another to his increase of honour. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more then Beglerbeg, as the Turkish Bajazar, are called, that is, Great above the Great.

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, between the times of Joseph and Acherres (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Joseph was) yet will I thereby seek, neither to fortifie mine own conjecture, as touching Joseph, nor to infer any likelihood of Acherres his being Uchoreus: For it might well be that Memphis was built by some such King as Joseph was Gebor, Lieutenant unto the Caliph Eleazar (see l. i. who having to his Masters self conquered Egypt, and 18. many other Countries, did build, not far from old Memphis, the great City of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it El Cabira, that is, an enforcing or an imperious Mistress, though he himself were a Dalmatian slave.

SECT. III.

Of Cherres, Armeus, Rameffes, and Ameno-phis. Of Myris, and the Lake that bears his name.

When Archerus had reigned eight years, Cherres succeeded and held the Kingdom fifteen years; then reigned Armeus five years, and after him Rameffes three score and eight. Of Armeus and Rameffes that History understood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greeks, under the names of Danaus and Egyptus. For it is said that Danaus, being expelled out of Egypt by his brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdom of Argos: that he had fifty Daughters, whom upon seeming reconciliation, he gave in marriage to his brothers fifty sons, but commanded every one of them to kill her husband the first night: that only Hippomele, one of his daughters, did save her husband Linceus, and suffered him to escape finally, that for this fact, all the bloody sisters, when they died, were enjoying this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking vessel with water.

The reign of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus was Danaus, and Rameffes, Egyptus, is more than Reynaeus believes: he rather takes Armeus to have been Myris, or Meris, who caused the great lake to be made which bears his name. For my own part, as I can easily believe, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of such quality as the Souldan Samar, of whom we spake before, I do not find how in so short a reign, as five years, a work of that labour could be finished, which was required unto the Lake of Myris, and the Monument therein whereof his own sepulchre and his wives being one part, it is manifest that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is uncertain, and of whose reigns we have no assurance, I may truly say, that their great works are not enough to prove them like those of Japheth, who bought all the people of Egypt as bondmen, and all their land for bread; of Ghorar, who founded Cairo; and of Samar, who made the Country Tributary: were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set down the length of their reigns whom we find to have followed one another in order of succession: but in rehearsing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris, is by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand six hundred furlongs in compass, and fifty furlongs deep. It served to relieve the waters of Nilus, when the overflow being too great, was harmful to the Country: and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the lake, when the River did not rise high enough. In opening the sluices of this Lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fifty talents; but the lake it self decayed that only seeing the tribute imposed upon him taken therein, was every day one talent, which Myris gave to his Wife to buy sweet ornaments and other Ornaments for her body. In the middle of it was left an Island, wherein were the Sepulchres of Myris and his Wife, and over each of them a Pyramid that was a turlough, or (according to Herodotus) fifty paces high; having on the tops their statues, sitting in Thrones. I find not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet it is very great. The years of Armeus are by Menathon divided, by inferring one Armeus (whom Eusebius omits) that should have reigned one year and odd months of the time: but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After Rameffes, his son Amoneph held the Kingdom forty years. Some give him only nineteen years; and Mercator thinks him to have been the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: wherof I have already spoken in the first Book.

SECT. IV.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynastie of the Larthes.

Sethus, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amoneph, fifty five years. To him are ascribed the famous acts of that ancient Sesoftris. But the state of the world was not such at these times, that to great an expedition as the old Sesoftris made, could have been either easily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he passed, had it now been performed: as any man will perceive, if he look upon my Chronological Table, and consider who lived with this Zethus. With this King began the Dynastie of the Larthes; which Reynaeus conjectures to have had the same signification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being lifted out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt) and to have signified as much as Imperators, or Generals. The Wars in which these Kings were Generals, I take to have been against the Aethiopians, for sure I am, that they troubled not the Country of Palestina, that lay next unto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they travelled over the desert sands, on the other hand, to seek matter of conquest, in the poor Countries of Africa. But these Generals (if the Larthes were such) were not many. Five only had that title; and the last of these took it perhaps, as hereditary from the first; in such sort as the Roman Emperors were proud, for a while, to be called Antonii, till the most unsuitable conditions of Heligabalus, made his successors forbear the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynasties (as appears by this particular) took name from the Kings; that the Kings also did administer the government themselves, and that therefore I am deceived in ascribing too much unto the Viceroys. But it is to be considered, that what is said of these Larthes, depends wholly upon conjecture, and that the authority of the Regents, or Viceroys, might be great enough, though some few Kings took the conduct of Armies into their own hands. For so we find in John Leo, that the Souldan of Egypt (after such time as the Souldan Saladin, murdering the Caliph, got the sovereignty to himself) had under him a Viceroy, titled Eddaguardare, who had authority to place, or displace any Magistrates or Officers; and that this same Family was almost as great as the Souldans own. Yet was there also the Amir Cabir, or Lord General of the Souldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might, as he thought good, spend of the Souldans treasure. So might the office of the Viceroys continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the charge, or title of Generals upon them, did somewhat abridge the greatness of the second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it skills not whence they were drawn: whether from their Country, as those of the Thebans and Delphians or or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time; as many think, that the seventeenth Dynastie was called of the Shepherds, because Japheth governed in part thereof; or from the Kings themselves that reigned; as this was said to be of the Larthes or Generals.

The next is Manetho (but Annius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes, or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, forasmuch as Vaphres, and Sefac, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let us now return to the business which we now left.

Rameffes was King after Zethus, or Sethus, three score and six years: his title is mistaken for that second Sesoftris, of whom I have spoken in the first Book. I find nothing worth rehearsing of this Rameffes, or of Amoneph and Amoneus, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned forty, the latter six and twenty years. Wherefore it may very well be, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditary.

Thorus, the last of the Larthes, reigned only seven years, yet he is thought to have been that Proetus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, saying, That he took Helena from Paris, and after the sack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus.

I need say no more in refutation of this, than that the time of Thorus his reign lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helena to her restitution.

This Proetus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thou, and others mentioned by Greek Writers in this business, or in other such matters, may seem to be under-Officers: for such only are like to have had their residence about Pharus, and the Sea-coast where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proetus who detained Helena, it is said that he could force things to come, and that he could change himself into all shapes: whereby is signified his crafty head. For which he is grown into a Proverb. The Poets figured him a Sea-god, and keeper of Nepune's Seal-fishes, for belike he was some under-Officer to the Admiral, having charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

Rempher the son of Proetus is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Raminthus, and tells a long tale fit to please children, of his covetousness, and how his Treasure-house was robbed by a cunning Thief, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may believe what he list. How long this King reigned I know not, nor think that either he or his Father did reign at all.

SECT. V.

Of the Egyptian Kings, whose names are found scattered in Jewish Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Egypt, according to Cedrenus. Of Vaphres and Sefac.

Many other names of Egyptian Kings are found scattered here and there: as Tompesphis, of whom Suidas delivers only the bare name and title: Senenares, or Senepes, mentioned in Macrobious, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Seyes, or Esenes, noted by occasion of a great Physician that lived under him: Bambiris, recorded by the same Suidas for his great justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gave Name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iceland, and that he combated with the Devil, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had been, or after him should be so mighty as himself. The Answer or confession of the Devil was remarkable, which I find Englished in the translation of Plinius, in his Works, Of the truths of the Christian Religion. The Greek Verbs are somewhat otherwise, and much more imperfect in those Copies that I have of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this:

First God, and next The Word, and then The Spirit, Which Three be One, and joy in One all Three:
Whose force is endless. Get thee hence frail
Wight,
The man of Life unknown, excellent thee.

I should have thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the form of invocation which Thulis used, and that clause of his, giving name to the Island: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seems to me, in giving to this King such profound antiquity of reign. Indeed the very name of that Book, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breed suspicion of some imposture: But the freely stuff that he sheds without of it, is such as would serve to discredit himself, were it not otherwise apparent that he was a man both devout and of good judgement, in matters that fell within his compass.

I will here set down a list of old Egyptian Kings delivered by him, and leave the censure to others.

The first King of Egypt, that he sets down, is Mizraim the son of Cham. After him, he finds many of a new race, deriving their pedigree thus. Nimrod the son of Chur, was also called Orus, and further took upon him the name of the Planet Saturn, had to Wife Semiramis, who was of his own Lineage and by her, three Sons; Picus, named Jupiter, Belus, and Ninus.

Picus chasing his Father out of Affrica into Italy, reigned in his stead thirty years, and then gave up that Kingdom to Juno his sister and wife, and to Belus his son: after which Belus, who reigned only two years, Ninus had the Kingdom, and married his own Mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italy to visit his old Father Saturn, Saturn forthwith reigned the Kingdom unto him. Picus Jupiter reigned in Italy three score and two years, had three score and ten Wives or Concubines, and about as many Children: finally died, and lies buried in the Isle of Crete.

The Principal of Jupiter's Sons were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo.

Enuus was called by the name of the Planet Mercury: He reigned in Italy after his Father, five and thirty years, and then (finding that all his Brethren conspired against him) he went into Egypt, with abundance of Treasure, where, after the death of Mizraim, he got the Kingdom, and held it nine and thirty years.

After Mercury, Vulcan reigned in Egypt four years and a half. Then Sol, the son of Vulcan, reigned twenty years and a half.

There followed in order Sofis, Ofiris, Orus and Thulis, of whom we spake before: the length of their several reigns is not set down.

After Thales, was the great Sisijris King, twenty years.

His Successor was Pharab, called Narcho, that held the Crown fifty years, with which there passed from him the surname of Pharab, to a very long posterity.

The reports of Codrenus I hold it enough to set down as I find them: let their credit rest upon the Author.

Others yet we find, that are said to have reigned in Egypt, without any certain note when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vain curiosity, in the search made after these already rehearsed, than of negligence, in omitting such as might have been added.

Vaphres, the father in law to Solomon and Sesac, the afflicter of Rehoboam, led us again into fair way, but not far.

The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but we are beholding to Clement Alexandrian and Eusebius for it. These give us not the length of his reign; but we know that he lived in the times of Darius and of Solomon. He came into Palatium with an Army, took Gexar from the Cananites, and gave it to his daughter, Solomon's Wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sesac his son did favour the Enemies of Solomon, who kept so many Wives and Concubines, besides his Egyptian Princesses.

In the life of Rehoboam all hath been written, that I find of Sesac, excepting the length of his reign, which must have been six and twenty years, if he were that Smendes, with whom, Eusebius begins the one and twentieth Dynasty.

Now forasmuch as it would serve to no great purpose, that we knew the length of Sesac his reign, and of others that followed him, unless therewithal we knew the beginning of Sesac, with which the reign have dependence; this course I take.

From the fourth year of Jehojakim King of Juda, in which Pharab Neco was slain, I reckon upwards the years of the same Neco, and of his Predecessors, unto the beginning of Sesac: by which account, the first year of Sesac is found concurrent with the twentieth of Solomon's reign, and the twenty sixth of Sesac with the fifth of Rehoboam, wherein Sesac spoiled the Temple, and dyed, enjoying the fruits of his Sacrilege no longer than Jas the Israelite, and Cassius the Roman did; who after him spoiled the Temple of Jerusalem.

To fill up the time between Sesac and Neco, I have rather taken those Kings that I find in the Greek Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of those that are delivered by Eusebius, we find no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, save only of Bocchoris, who is remembered by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appear to have been a King.

Henceunto I may add, that the Succession is often interrupted in Eusebius by Ethiopian, which got the Kingdom often and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appears by the Prophet Ezra, that the Countess of Pharab did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, inasmuch that they said of Pharab, I am the son of the Wife, I am the son of the Ancient King.

But that which overthrows the reckoning of Eusebius, is the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it please him well to see how the reigns of Josaf and Neco next by his computation, yet this indeed mars all, the reign of Josaf being misplaced. This error grows from his omitting to compare the reigns of the Kings of Juda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion Joram King of Israel is made to reign three years after Ahasia of Juda: Samaria is taken by Salmanassar before Ezechia was King; and in a word, all, or most of the Kings have their beginnings placed in some other year of their collaterals, than the Scriptures have determined.

SECT. VI.

Of Chemnis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned between the times of Rehoboam and Ezechia.

Following therefore the Greek Historians, I place Chemnis, or (according to Diodore) Chemis, first in the rank of those that were Kings after Sesac. He reigned fifty years, and built the greatest of the three Pyramids, which was accounted one of the three Worlds Wonders. The Pyramid hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottom upwards narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemnis being four-square, had a Base of seven Acres every way, and was about six acres high. It was of a very hard and durable stone, which lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand years, without complaining of any injury that it had suffered by weather in so long space. From the reign of Chemnis, unto the age of Augustus Caesar, wherein Diodore lived, are indeed a thousand years; which do give the better likelihood unto this time wherein Chemnis is placed. As for this and other Pyramids, late Writers do tellify, that they have seen them yet standing.

After Chemnis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his Brother, but doubtfully, and inclining rather to the opinion, that his son Chabrenes succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabrenes) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to have been brethren; but the length of their reigns may argue the latter to have been long to the former: for Cheops reigned fifty years: Cephrenes fifty six. These were, as Chemnis had been, builders of Pyramids, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who already had overlaboured themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramids were ordained to be Tombs for those that raised them; but the malice of the Egyptians is said to have called out their bodies, and to have called their Monuments by the name of an Herdman, that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of the honour, and the calling out of their bodies, or otherwise it is hard to conceive how it might be, that they, who had not power to avoid the like slavery laid upon them by the younger Brother or son, should have power or leisure to take such revenge upon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale devised against Cheops his Daughters, that her Father wanting money, did prostitute her, and that the getting of every man that accompanied her, one stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramid, that stood in the midst of the other three. Be-like he was an infolent Lady and made them follow their drudgery for her sake, longer a while than they thought to have done, in raising a Monument with the superfluity of her Fathers provisions.

Myserinus the son of Cephrenes, reigned after his Father

ther six years. He would have built as his fore-goes did, but prevented by death, finished not what he had begun. The people thought him a good King, for that he did not open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatened him with a short life of six years only, because of this his devotion: For (said the Oracle) Egypt should have been afflicted an hundred and fifty years, which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their parts; but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou live but six years. It is very strange, that the gods should be offended with a King for his piety; or that they should decree to make a Country impious, when the people were desirous to serve them; or that they having so decreed, it should lie in the power of a King to alter them, and make the ordinance of the gods to fail in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian gods. The true God was doubtless more offended with the institution of such Idolatry, than with the interruption. And who knows whether Chemnis did not learn somewhat at Jerusalem in the last year of his Father Sesac, that made him perceive, and deliver to those that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian superstition? Most sure it is that in his reign, and the reigns of Cheops and Cephrenes, were more long and more happy than that of Myserinus, who to delude the Oracle, revolved away both days and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, he had changed his nights into dayes, and so doubled the time appointed: a service more pleasing to the Devil, than the restitution of Idolatry durst then seem, when it could speed no better. I find in Reyneccius, fifty years assigned to this King; which I verily believe to have been some error of the print; though I find it not corrected among other such over-sights: For I know no Author that gives him so many years, and Reyneccius himself takes notice of the Oracle, that threatened Myserinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bocchoris is placed next unto Myserinus; by Diodore, who speaks no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, and excelling his predecessors in it. He is spoken of by divers Authors as one that loved luxury; and may be taken for that Banchis, whom Suidas commends in that kind: Eusebius reckons 44. years of his reign.

After Bocchoris, one Sabacus an Ethiopian, follows in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certain ages after him. Herodotus quite omitting Bocchoris, hath Aphidius, who made a sharp law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paid. This Aphidius made a Pyramid of brick, more costly and fair, in his own judgment, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Aphidius, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, a blind man, before the Ethiopian. The reigns of these two are perhaps those many ages which the Egyptians, to magnify their antiquities, accounted between Bocchoris and him that followed them. But all this could make but six years; and so long doth Funtilius, so long doth Reyneccius hold, that these two Kings between them both did govern. Many man would lengthen this time, hold it improbable that the reigns of two Kings should have been so soon spent; he may do it by taking some years from Sethon or Psammis, and adding them to either of these. To add unto these, without subtracting from some other, would breed a manifest inconvenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his reign, must have been in the fifth of Rehoboam, as also the last of Pharab Neco was the fourth of Jehojakim, and the first of Nebuchadnezzar. For mine own part I like it better to allow six years only to these two Kings, than to lose the witness of Herodotus, who concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speak of Senacherib's war, at which time Sethon was King of Egypt. I will not therefore add years unto these obscure names; for by adding unto the years, three years, we shall thrust the beginning of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Senacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him in his Egyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great envy to leave both Aphidius and Anysis out of the roll, which were easily done by placing Sesac lower, and extending his life yet six years further, or more (if abridgement shall be required of Psammis his reign) into the years of Rehoboam.

Of Sabacus the Ethiopian, who took the Kingdom from Anysis, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fifty years: He was a merciful Prince, not punishing all capital offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour upon malefactors; by whose toil he both got much wealth into his own hands, letting out their service to hire, and performed many works of more use than pomp, to the singular benefit of the Country.

Zonaras calls this King Sus; the Scriptures call him So.

Hefsa, the last King of Israel, made a league with him against Salmanassar, uncle to his god: for the Egyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserve the Israelite from destruction.

It seems, that the encroaching power of the Affyrin grew terrible to Egypt about these times: the victories of Tiglat-Pileassar and Salmanassar having eaten so far into Syria, in the reign of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his days (for his reign began in the fourth of Manabon) that Psad himself did make the first entrance into Palatium. This caused So to animate the half-subdued people against their Conquerors; but the help which he and his Successor gave them was so faint, that Senacherib's Embassage compared the Egyptian succour to a broken staff or Reed. Such indeed had Hefsa found it, and such Ezechia might have found it, had he not been supported by the strong staff of him, that ruleth all thing with a rod of iron.

It appeareth by the words of Rabshake, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Egyptian forces, for Charis and Hofe-man, with this power, whatsoever it was, grew necessary, within a little while, for the defence of Egypt it self, which So left unto Sethon his Successor, having now fulfilled the fifty years of his reign.

Herodotus and Diodorus have both one tale, from relation of Egyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he left the Country, and willingly retired unto Ethiopia, because it was often signified unto him in his dreams, by the god which was worshipped at Thebes, that his reign should be neither long nor prosperous, unless he flew all the Priests in Egypt; which rather than to do, he reformed his Kingdom. Surely, the Egyptian gods were of a strange quality, that so ill rewarded their servants, and invited Kings to do them wrong. Well might the Egyptians (as their like-wise did) worship Dogs as gods, when their chief gods had the property of Dogs, which love their Masters the better for beating them.

Yet to what end the Priests should have signified this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I think that it might be some device of the fearful old man, who seeing his Realm in danger of an Invasion, sought an honest honest excuse for his departure out of it, and withdrawing himself into Ethiopia, where he had been bred in his youth. What if I should say, that the Ethiopia into which he went, was none other than Aethi, when of Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the instigation of this man) raised an Army against Sennacherib, when he meant to invade Egypt within two or three years after? But I will not trouble my self with much enquiry. This I hold, that Sis, or Sabacum was not indeed an Ethiopian (for in his time lived the Prophet Ezay, who mentions the antiquity of Pharaoh's house) but only so furnished for his education, and because issuing from thence, he got the Kingdom from Affyr, who was his opposite. The quiet and mild form of his government, his holding the Kingdom so long without an Army, and many other circumstances argue no less. But whether really he betook to a private life, or whether he fore-went his life and Kingdom at once, being now very old, it is time that we leave him, and speak of Seton his next Successor, who is omitted by Plinius, but remembered by Herodotus, by a sure token of his having been King.

SECT VII.

Of Seton who reigned with Ezechia, and sided with him against Sennacherib.

THE first year of Seton's reign falls into the twelfth of Ezechia, which was the fifth of Sennacherib. It was a troublesome age, and full of danger: the two great Kingdoms of Affyr and Egypt, being then engaged in a War, the issue whereof was to determine whether of them should rule or serve. The Affyr had the better men of War; the Egyptians better provision of necessities: the Affyr more Subjects; the Egyptians more Friends; and among the new conquered, half Subjects of Affyr, many that were Egyptian in heart, though Affyr in outward show.

Of this last sort, were Ezechia and his people; who knowing how much it concerned Pharaoh to protect them against his own great Enemy, preferred the friendship of so near and mighty a Neighbour, before the service of a terrible, yet far removed King. But herein was great difference between Ezechia and his Subjects: For the good King fixing his special confidence in God, held that course of policy, which he thought most likely to turn to the benefit of his Country; the multitude of Judeas looking into the fair hopes which this Egyptian league promised, were puffed up with vain conceits, thinking that all was life, and that now they should not need to fear any more of those injuries which they had suffered by the Affyr, and to become forgetful of God, taking comfort, but not of him. The Prophet Ezay complaining much of this presumption, giving the people of Juda to understand, That the Egyptians were men, and not Gods, and their Horse flesh, and not spirits; that God himself should defend Juda upon repentance, and that Assur should fall by the sword, but not of man. Ezay 30. 7. As for the Egyptians (said the Prophet) they are vanity, and they shall help in vain, their strength is to fit still.

According to the Prophets words, it came to pass. For in the treaty of Confederacy that was held at Zan, all manner of contentment and assurance was given to the Jews by Seton, or his Agents, who filled them with such reports, of Horles and Chariots, that they did not seek (as Ezay saith) unto the holy Ezay 31. 1. One of Israel, nor look unto the Lord. But he yet is swift.

After a while came Sennacherib with his Army, and wakened them out of these dreams: for Seton their good Neighbour, as near as he was, did seem far off, being unready when his help was most needful. It may seem that he purposed rather to make Pelesetia, than Egypt the Stage, whereon this great War should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Affyr and Jews, weakening one another, should yield unto him a fair advantage over both. Yet he fought with money; for he sent Horles and Camels laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Ezay 14. 30. 6. calls A People that cannot profit.

These Arabians did not profit indeed; (for besides that it seems by the same place of Ezay, that the rich treasures miscarried, and fell into the Enemies hands, before any help appeared from Tirhaka) all the strong Cities of Juda were taken by Sennacherib, except Lilba, Lachin and Jerusalem it fell, till the Sword of God and not of Man, defeated the Affyr, who did go, far, far, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Ninive, where he was Ezay 31. 9. slain.

Concerning this expedition of Sennacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Egypt, where the men of War, being offended with Seton their Kings, who had taken away their allowance, refused to bear Arms in defence of him and their Country; that Seton being Vulcan's Priest, benombed himself to his god, who by dream promised to send him helpers, that hereupon Seton, with such as would follow him (which were craftsmen, shop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Pelesetia, and that a great multitude of Field-Mice entering the Camp of Sennacherib by night, did so gnaw the Bows, Quivers, and straps of his men's Armour, that they were fain the next day to fly away in all haste finding themselves disarmed.

In memory hereof (saith Herodotus) the Statue of this King is set up in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this Inscription, Let him that holds me, Serve God.

Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priests, wherein how far they swerved from the truth, being desirous to magnify their own King, it may easily be perceived. It seems that this Image of Seton was fallen down, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbear to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the nation of the Jews was then well known to the world, whereof every child could have told how much falsehood had been mingled with the truth.

We find this History agreeable to the Scriptures, thus far forth: That Sennacherib King of the Affyr and Arabians, (so Herodotus calls him: the Syrians, or peradventure some borders upon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) lived in this age, made War upon Egypt, and was miraculously driven home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did unto his Priest, happy it was (if Seton were a Priest) that he took his god now in so good a mood: For within three or four years before this, all the Priests in Egypt should have been slain, if the merciful King had not spared their lives, as we have seen against the gods will. Therefore this last good turn was not enough to serve as an example, that might stir up the Egyptians to piety, seeing that their devotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I think, that this Image did represent Sennacherib himself, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian manner of expressing things) the shameful issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Army, by means, which came, no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed upon this ungodly King, was indeed a very good motive to piety. But the Emblem, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chief Temple in that Town where this Image was erected) might give occasion to such a fable; the Devil helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour.

Yet that we may not belie the Devil, I hold it very likely, that Seton finding himself in danger, did call upon his gods, that is, upon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had most devotion. But to had other of his predecessors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Jews (even such of them as were most given to Idolatry) would have been ashamed of the confidence which they reposed in the Chariots of Egypt, because they were many, and in show terrible, because they were very strong; had it been told them, that Seton, instead of sending those Horlemen and Chariots, was beseeching Vulcan to send him and them good luck; or else (for the call was Egyptian gods) addressing their prayers to some Ouyon or Cat.

However it was, doubtless the Prophecy of Ezay took effect, which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor help, nor do them good, but shall be a shame and also a reproach. Such is commonly the issue of humane wisdom, when resting secure upon provision which it self hath made, it will no longer seem to stand in need of God.

Some there are who take Seton to have been set down by Eusebius under the name of Tarachus the Ethiopian; and therefore the twenty years which are given to Tarachus, they allow to the reign of Seton.

These have well observed that Tarachus the Ethiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Egypt, but as a friend to that Countrey, or at least an enemy to Sennacherib, in the War last spoken of; the Ethiopian (as they are Englished) over which he reigned, being indeed Cushites or Arabians.

Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they think that this Tarachus or Tirhaka is placed in the room of Seton, and therefore give to Seton the twenty years of Tarachus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Ethiopian (as he is called) began his reign over Egypt, by Eusebius his account, after the death of Sennacherib and of Ezechia, in the first year of Manasse's King of Juda. Therefore he or his years have no reference to Seton.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Seton reigned; Functus peremptorily citing no Author, nor alledging reason for it, sets him down thirty three years: many omit him quite; and they that name him are not careful to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that Rule which I propounded unto my self at the first, for measuring the reigns of these Egyptian Kings.

The years which passed from the fifth of Rehobam, unto the fourth of Jehojakim, I do divide among the Egyptians, that giving to every one the proportion allowed unto him by the Author, in whom he is found, the rest is to be conferred upon him whose length of reign is uncertain: that is, upon this Seton.

By this account I find the thirty three years that are set down by Functus, to agree very nearly, if not precisely, with the time of Seton's reign; therefore I conform my own reckoning to his, though I could be content to have it one year less.

The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Psammetichus, whereupon it hath much dependence, and whereunto the course of this History will shortly bring me, the Egyptian list is growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Juda, to which it is meet that I return.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of MANASSES, and his Contemporaries.

SECT. I.

The wickedness of Manasses. His Imprisonment, Repentance, and Death.

MANASSAH the Son of Ezechias, forgetting the piety of his Father, and the prosperity which followed him, set up, repaired, adorned and furnished all the Altars, Temples and high Places, in which the Devil was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, he himself esteemed the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, with all the Host of Heaven, as Gods, and worshipped them, and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his Sons to a Sacrifice to the Devil Moloch or Moloch, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhinnon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Devil.

He also gave himself to all kind of Witch-craft and Sorcery, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent blood, as Jerusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reproached by that aged and revered Prophet Isay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Jews affirm, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet near unto the Fountain of Siloe, to be fawn in sunder with a wooden Saw, in the eightieth year of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous than hath been heard of. The Scriptures indeed are silent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captains of the Host of the Kings of Ashur, which took Manasse, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chains, and carried him to Babel: Where, after he had lived twenty years as a captive, and dispossessed of all honour and hope; yet to his hearty repentance and continual prayer, the God of infinite mercy had respect, and moved the Assyrian heart to deliver him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loved his father Ezechias, was the easier persuaded to restore Manasse to his liberty and estate. After which, and when he was again established, remembering the miseries which followed his wickedness, and Gods great mercies towards him, he changed form, dejected his former foolishness and devilish Idolatry, erected down the Idols of his own erecting, prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Jerusalem: and dyed after the long reign of fifty five years. Chysos and Suidas report, that Manasse was held in a Cage of Iron by the Assyrians: and therein fed with bread of barley and water, which men may believe as it shall please their fancies.

SECT. II.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of Setchon. The reign of Psammiticus.

THAT the wickedness of King Manasses was the cause of the evil which fell upon his Kingdom and person, any Christian must needs believe: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things in those parts of the World such, at that time, as would have invited any Prince (and did perhaps invite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, upon his Empire) to make attempt upon Juda. For the Kingdom of Egypt, which was become the pillar wherein the state of Juda leaned, about these times was miserably distressed with civil dissension, and after two years ill amended by a division of the government between twelve Princes. After some good agreement between these, eleven of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himself absolute King of all.

This Inter-regnum, or meer Anarchy that was in Egypt, with the division of the Kingdom following it, is placed by Diadore who omitteth Setchon, between the reign of Sabacus and Psammiticus: but Herodotus doth set the Aristocracy, or twelve Governors immediately before Psammiticus, who was one of them, and after Setchon. The occasion of this dissension seems to have been the uncertainty of Title to that Kingdom (for that the Crown of Egypt passed by succession of blood, I have often shewed) which ended for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, though things were not settled until one had obtained the Sovereignty.

These twelve Rulers governed fifteen years in good seeming agreement, which to preserve, they made a strict covenant and alliances one with another, being jealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, nothing him by this token, that he should make a drink-offering in Vulcan's Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilst this unity lasted, they joined together in raising a Monument of their Dominion; which was a Labyrinth, built near unto the Lake of Meris, a work so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who be- holding it, affirms) no words could give it commendation answerable to the stateliness of the work itself. I will not here set down that imperfect description which Herodotus maketh of it, but think enough to say that he prefers it very far before the Pyramids, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or or any of the fairest works in Greece. Diadore reports this Labyrinth to have been the work of Merus or Menides, a King which lived five generations before Psotus, this is before the War of Troy, and from this Labyrinth (Lith he) Dadalus took the pattern of that which he made for Minus in Crete. Who this Merus, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reynecius takes him to have been Anemetus, which reigned immediately before Thurius. But this agrees not with Diadore, for Dadalus and Minus were both dead long before Anemetus was King. Belike Reynecius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Cherenon and others; that are found in Josephus, touching Anemophilus and his children, to the story of Menides and Adisanes the Ethiopian mentioned by Diadore, held it consequent, after he had conjectured Manethon's Anemophilus to be Diadore's his Anasis; that Setchon should be Adisanes, and that Anemetus should be Merus. If in this case I might intrude a conjecture, the times which we now handle are those about which Reynecius hath erred in making search. Anasis was Anasis, Adisanes was Sabacus; and Merus was one of these twelve Princes to whom Herodotus gives the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Adisanes the Ethiopian, deposed Anasis; Sabacus the Ethiopian, deposed Anasis; Adisanes governed well, and was mild in punishing offenders; so likewise was Sabacus; Merus the next King after Adisanes, built this Labyrinth; and the next (giving Setchon, whom Diadore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same work, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to hear the truth, as living nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The variety of names, and difference of times wherein Diadore believed the Priests, might be a part of the Egyptian vanity, which was familiar with them in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. I might add, that the twelve great Halls, Parlours, and other circumstances remembered by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, do help to prove that it was the work of these twelve Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a solemn feast in Vulcan's Temple, when they were to make their drink-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himself, brought forth no more than eleven Cups, Heretupon, Psammiticus, who standing last, had not a Cup, took off his brazen Helmet; and therewith supplied the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him a Traytor, yet, when they found that it was done by him upon set purpose or ill intent, they forbore to kill him, but being jealous of their estate, they banished him into the marshy Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the event is held by Diadore as a fable, which I believe to have been none other: In the rest, Herodotus and Diadore agree, saying that Psammiticus hired Soldiers out of Caria and Lydia, by whose aid he vanquished his Companions, and made himself sole King.

The years of his reign, according to Herodotus, were fifty four; according to Eusebius, forty four; Mercator, to reconcile these two, gives forty four years to his single reign, and ten to his ruling jointly with the Princes before spoken of. Indeed, he that was admitted, being a man grown (for he cannot in reason be supposed to have been then a young fellow) is to be thought to have lived unto extrem age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threecore and nine years. I therefore yield rather to Eusebius, but will not adventure to cut five years from the Aethiopia: though peradventure Psammiticus was not as first one of the twelve, but succeeded (either by election, or as next in blood) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten years companion in that government.

Another trouble there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The years of the Egyptians, as we find them set down, are more by one, than serve to fill up the time between the fifth of Nebuchodon and the fourth of Josaphat. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one year from Sethon's reign, that was of uncertain length, or else (which I had rather do, because Fautinus may have followed better authority than I know, or than himself altogether, in giving to Sethon a time so nearly agreeing with the truth) we must confound the last year of one reign with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set down in Chronologies, tables, reigned precisely for many years as are ascribed unto them, without any fractions: it is enough to think that the surplussage of one mans time supplied the defect of another. Wherefore I confound the last year of those fifteen, wherein the twelve Princes ruled, with the first of Psammiticus; who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himself Lord alone all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Egypt who entertained any stratagem with the Greeks; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Soldiers, by allowing them in the left wing of his Army, whilst his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honourable place) in an expedition that he made in Syria. Upon this disgrace it is said, that his Soldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, forsook their natural Country of Egypt, and went into Ethiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be revoked by kind Messages, nor by the King himself, who overtook them on the way; but when he told them of their Country, their Wives and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Country, and that nature had enabled them to get other Wives and Children.

It is also reported of him. That he caused two Infants to be brought up in such sort, as they might not hear any word spoken; by which means, he hoped to find out what Nation or Language was most ancient; so far as it seemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speak that Language which men spoke at the first. The issue hereof was that the children cryed, Brevor, Brevor, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, served greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquity. Gorgias Becinus makes no small matter of this for the honour of his Low-Dutch, in which the word Becker signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turn over any part of Gorgias his works, may find enough of this kind, to persuade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarchs used none other language than the Low-Dutch, before the confusion of Languages at Babel, the name it self Babel being also Dutch, and given by occasion of this confusion; for that there they began to babble and talk one knew not what.

But I will not insist upon all that is written of Psammiticus. The most remarkable of his acts was the siege of Asorus in Palestine, about which he spent nine and twenty years. Never have we heard (saith Herodotus) that any City endured so long a siege as this; yet Manassés carried it at the last. This Town of dester had been won by Tartan a Captain of Sennacherib's, and was now, as it seemeth, relieved, but in vain, by the Babylonians, which made it hold out so well.

SECT. III.

What reference these Egyptian matters might have to the imprisonment and enlargement of Manassés. In what part of his reign Manassés was taken prisoner.

WERE it certainly known, in what year of his reign Manassés was taken prisoner, and how long it was before he obtained liberty, I think we should find these Egyptian troubles to have been no small occasion both of his captivity and enlargement: God fo disposing of humane actions, that even they who intended only their own business, fulfilled only his high pleasure. For either the civil Wars of Egypt that followed upon the death of Setbon, or the reuniting of the Kingdom, as it were into twelve pieces, or the War between Psammetichus and his Colleague, or the expedition of Psammetichus into Syria, and the siege of dester, might minister unto the Babylonians, either such cause of hope to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts, or such necessity of sending an Army into those parts, to defend his own, as would greatly tempt him to make sure work with the King of Juda. The same occasion sufficed also to procure the delivery of Manassés, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Josephus hath it) by subtilty, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, win his Country, but only wait it. So that the Jews, having learned wit by the ill success of their folly, in redeeming Amazias, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargain upon such another accident: and the Babylonians (to whom the Egyptian matters presented more weighty argument of hope and fear, than the little Kingdom of Juda could afford) had no reason to spend his forces in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficulty as a greater, whereby he should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement when by quitting his present advantage over the Jews, he might make his way the faster into Egypt.

Now concerning the year of Manassés his reign, wherein he was taken prisoner, or concerning his captivity it self, how long it lasted, the Scriptures are silent, and Josephus gives no information. Yet I find cited by Tornilius three opinions: the one of Bellarmino, who thinks that Manassés was taken in the fiftieth year of his reign; the other of the greater Hebrew Chronology, who affirms, that it was in his twenty seventh year; the third of Rabbi Kimki upon Ezechiel, who saith, that he was forty years an Idolater, and lived fifteen years after his repentance. The first of their conjectures is upheld by Tornilius, who rejects the second, as more unprobable, and condemns the third as most false. Yet the reasons alleged by Tornilius in defence of the first, and refutation of the opinion, are such as may rather prove him to favour the Cardinal as far as he may, (for where need requires, he doth freely dissent from him) than to have used his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before he gave his judgment. Two arguments he brings to maintain the opinion of Bellarmino, the one, that Amnon the Son of Manassés, is said by Josephus to have followed the works of his fathers youth; the other, that Manassés grown old in his sins, it is like that he should have continued as he did, in his amendment unto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason why the sins of Manassés might not be distinguished from his repentance in his old age, by calling them works of his youth, which appeared when he was twelve years old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimki) until he was but fifteen years from death. Touching the second; howsoever it be a fearful thing, to cast off unto the last those good motions unto repentance, which we know not whether ever God will offer unto us again, yet I scarce it a terrible heaving. That the sins which are not forsaken before the age of two and fifty years, shall be punished with final impenitency. But against these two collections of Tornilius, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not unlikely, that Manassés continued longer in his wickedness than Bellarmino hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimki hath affirmed. In the second book of Kings, the evil which Manassés did, is remembered at large, and his repentance utterly omitted: so that his amendment may seem to have taken up no great part of his life. The story of him being thus concluded in the one and twentieth Chapter: Contemner ^{2 Kings 21. 47.} the rest of the Acts of Manassés, and all that he did, and the sin that he sinned, are they not written in the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda? The other place is in the four and twentieth Chapter of the same Book, where, in rehearsing the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Jehoiakim, the great Grand-child of this Manassés, it is said; Surely by the commandment of the Lord came this upon Juda, that he might put them out of his sight, for the sins of Manassés, according to all that he did, and for the innocent blood that he shed (for he filled Jerusalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who fo considers well these places, may find small cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manassés was no earlier than fifteen years before his death; or most probable, That when he was twenty seven years old, he repented, and becoming a new man, lived in the fear of God forty years after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth cannot be discovered. It sufficeth to say, that two years of civil dissensions in Egypt, fourteen or fifteen years following, wherein that Kingdom was weakened by partition of the Sovereignty: the War of Psammetichus against his Associates; and four and twenty years of the nine and twenty, wherein the siege of Azenon continued, being all within the time of Manassés, did leave no part of his reign (after the first fifteen years) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonians, whose men of war had continual occasions of visiting his Country. All which I will add hereto, is this: that the fiftieth of Manassés was the last year of Setbon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Meredach his reign, or (accounting from the death of Alshadad) the twentieth: The seven and twentieth of Manassés was the tenth of the twelve Princes, and the three and fortieth of Meredach: his fortieth was the twenty third of Psammetichus, and the fifth of Nabulassar, the son of Meredach, in Babylon: but which of these was the year of his imprisonment, or whether any other, I forbear to give mine opinion, least I should thereby seem to draw all matters over violently to mine own computation.

This was the first great matter that the Babylonians nians had of the Kingdom of Juda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmansar, yet Ezechias never paid it. True it is, that he hoped to stay Sennacherib's enterprise against him, by presenting him with three hundred talents of silver, and thirty of gold, besides the plate which covered the doors and pillars of the Temple.

But Manassés being pressed with great necessity, could refuse no tolerable conditions, that the Babylonians would impose upon him; among which it seems that this was one, (which was indeed a point of servitude) that he might not hold peace with the Egyptians, whilst they were enemies to Babylon. This appears not only by his fortifying with men of War all the strong Cities of Juda after his return (which was rather against Psammetichus, whose party he had forsaken, than against the Babylonians, with whom he had thenceforth no more controverſie) but likewise by that opposition, which Jofias made afterwards to Phrao Neco, in favour of Nabulassar, which had been against all reason or policy, if it had not been his duty by covenant. Of this I will speak more in convenient place.

SECT. IV.

Of the first and second Messenian Wars, which were in the reigns of Ezechias and Manassés, Kings of Juda.

NOW concerning such actions as were performed abroad in the World, about these times of Manassés, the most remarkable were the Messenian Wars; which happened in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, between the Trojan and Perſian Wars, deserve not to be passed over with silence.

The first Messenian War began and ended in the days of Ezechias; the second in the reign of Manassés: but to avoid the trouble of interrupting our History, I have thought it best to rehearse them both in this place. Other Introduction is needless, than to say, that the posterity of Heracles, driving the issue of Pelops, and the Achaens out of their seats, divided their lands between themselves, and erected the kingdoms of Lacedemon, Argos, Messenia and Corinth: all which agreeing well together awhile, did afterwards forget the bond of kindred, and fought one another with bloody wars; whereof these Messenian Wars were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian War are scarce worth remembrance, they were fo slight. Ambition was the true cause of it: wherewith the Lacedemonians were so transported, that any thing served them as a colour to accomplish their greedy desire. Yet other matter was alledged; namely, that one Polycharas a Messenian had slain many Lacedemonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to have him yielded into their hands, could not obtain it. The Messenians on the other side, excused Polycharas, for what he was grown frantic, through injuries received from Eugamenes a Lacedemonian. This Eugamenes had bargained to give pasture to the Cattle of Polycharas, and was therefore to receive part of the increase: but not contented with the gain appointed, he sold the Cattel, and slaves that kept them, to Merchants; which done, he came with a fair tale to his friend, saying, that they were stolen. Whilst the lie was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the slaves that had escaped from the Merchants came in with a true report of all. The Lacedemonian being thus de-prehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; to which to receive, he carried the son of Polycharas home with him, but having him at home, he villainously slew him. Wherefore the Lacedemonians having refused, after long suite made by the wretched Father, to do him right against this Thief and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrel out of those things which he did in that madness, whereto they themselves had cast him. So said the Messenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or stand unto the judgement of the Ampſicynets, who were as the general Council of Greece, or to any other fair course. But the Lacedemonians, who had a great desire to occupy the fair Country of Messenia, that lay close by them, were not content with false allegations. They thought it enough to have some shew for their doings; which the better to colour, they reckoned up many old injuries, and fo without sending any challenge, secretly took an oath to hold War with Messenia till they had mattered it: which done, they sailed upon Ampſia, a frontier Town of that Province, wherein they put all to the sword without mercy, very few escaped.

Hereupon the Messenians took Arms, and were met by the Enemy. A furious Battel was fought between them, which ended not until dark night, with uncertain Victory. The Messenians did strongly encamp themselves; the Lacedemonians, unable to force their Camp, returned home.

This War began in the second year of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, having lasted twenty years. The two enemy Nations tried the matter for a while, with their proper forces, the Lacedemonians waiting the in-land parts of Messenia; and the Messenians, the Sea-coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere Wars on both sides, were called in to help. The Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians took part with Messenia; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their own, aid from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Greece. So a second, third, and fourth battel were fought, with as great obstinacy as the first; saving that in the fourth battel the Lacedemonians were enticed to turn their backs; in the other fights, the Victory was still uncertain, though in one of them the Messenians lost Euphrates their King, in whose dead they chose Argistodemus.

Many years were spent ere all this blood was shed; for pellucid Diseases, and want of money to entertain Souldiers, caused the War to linger. And for the same reasons, did the Messenians forsake all their in-land Towns, excepting Ithome, which was a Mountain with a Town upon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to do. But as the Authors tell us, the Lacedemonians were so obstinate in this War, because of their Vow, that having alienated themselves ten years from Sparta, the Wives felt them word, that their City would grow unpopulated, by reason that no children had been born in them in all that time: Whereupon they sent back all their abject young men, promiscuously to accompany the young women, who got fo many of them with child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians.

Didorus refers the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time.

But in process of this Messenian War, when the Devil in an Oracle had advised the Messenians to sacrifice a Virgin of the stock of * Egyptus, that fo they might be victorious against the Lacedemonians; the fo talling upon the Daughter of one Lysicles, Epiborus the Priest, willing to save her, said, she was only a fostered child, and not born of the wife of Lysicles; so god, which answer giving delay to the execution of the Maid, Lycesias secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Arifdemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his own Daughter: but a young Nobleman, being in love with the Maid, when otherwise he could not prevail, laid openly that she was no Virgin, but that he had deflowered her, and got her with child; whereupon the Father in a rage ripped up his innocent Daughters belly to disprove the Lovers slander: at the grave of which Daughter of his, afterwards falling, by other superstitious, into dispair of prevailing against the Lacedæmonians, he flew himself to the great hurt of his Country, which he loved most dearly. For after his death, the Meſſenians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craved peace, which they obtained with most rigorous conditions. All the yearly fruits of their Lands they were bound to send unto Sparta; and they, with their Wives, to make solemn lamentations at the death of every Spartan King; they were also sworn to live in true conjunction to the Lacedæmonians; and part of their Territory was taken from them, which was given unto the Aſines, and such as had followed the Spartans in this War.

This peace being made upon so uneven terms, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirty years it continued (the Meſſenians not finding how to help themselves) and then broke out into a new and more furious War than the former. The able young men, that were grown up in the room of those Meſſenians whom the former War had consumed, began to consider their own strength and multitude, thinking themselves equal to the Lacedæmonians; and therefore scorned to serve such Masters as had against all right oppressed their Fathers.

The chief of these was Ariftemus, a Noble Gentleman of the house of Egyptus; who perceiving the uniform defects of his Country-men, adventured to become their Leader. He therefore founding the affections of the Argives and the Arcadians, which he found thoroughly answerable to his purpose, began upon War upon the State of Lacedæmon. This was in the fourth year of the three and twentieth Olympiad, when the Lacedæmonians halted to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with such forces as they could raise of their own without troubling their friends, meaning to deal with their enemies, ere any succour were lent them. So a bloody battle was fought between them and a doubtfully true that the Meſſenians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords to think them their equals. Particularly, the valour of Ariftemus appeared such in this fight, that his people would have made him their King: but he, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their General.

Within one year another battle was fought, whereunto each part came better provided. The Lacedæmonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to help; the Meſſenians had the Argives, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloody fight; but Ariftemus did himself brave himself, that finally he made the Enemies run for their lives. Of such importance was this victory, that the Lacedæmonians began to bethink themselves of making some good agreement. But one Tyrinus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, rebuked their spirits with his Verses. After this, Ariftemus took away by surprise a Town in Læonia, and vanquished in fight Antaxander King of Sparta, who did set upon him in hope to have recovered the booty.

But all those victories of Ariftemus perished, in the loss of one battle, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or fairly the profit, fell upon the Lacedæmonians, through the treason of Ariftrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with money, fled away, and left the Meſſenians exposed to cruel butchery. The loss was so great, that together with Andania their principal City, all the Towns of Meſſene, standing too far from the Sea, were abandoned for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be safe abroad, was conveyed into a place of safety. Here the Lacedæmonians found a tedious work, that held them eleven years. For besides that Era it self was a strong place, Ariftemus with three hundred stout Soldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindered their attendance on the siege. He seized all the fields of Meſſene, that were in the enemies power, and broke into Læonia, taking away Corn, Wine, Cattel, and all Provisions, necessary for his own People, the Slaves and household stuff he changed into money, suffering the owners to redeem them. To remedy this mischief, the Lacedæmonians made an Edict, that neither Meſſene, nor the adjoining parts of their own Country, should be killed or husbanded; which had a great tumult among private men, that were almost undone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrinus appealed this upore with pleasing Songs. But Ariftemus grew so bold, that he not only ranged over all the fields, but adventured upon the Towns, surprised, and sacked Amyle, and finally caused the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other services, three Ariftemus was taken prisoner, yet still he escaped. One escape of his deserves to be remembered, as a thing very strange and marvellous. He had with too much courage adventured to set upon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken up senseless, and carried away prisoner, with fifty of his Companions. There was a deep natural Cave into which the Spartans used to cast head-long such as were condemned to dye for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Ariftemus and his companions adjudged. All the rest of these poor men dyed with their falls; Ariftemus (howsoever it came to pass) took no harm.

Yet was it hard enough to be imprisoned in a deep Dungeon, among dead Carcasses, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench. But after a while he perceived by some faint glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Fox that was gnawing upon a dead body. Hereupon he bethought himself, that this beast must needs know some way to enter the place, and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold upon it, and catching it by the tail with one hand, saved himself from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coat into the mouth of it. So letting it creep whether it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, until the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Fox being loose, ran through a hole at which came in a little light; and there did Ariftemus deliver so long with his nails, that at last he clawed out his passage. When some fugitives of Meſſene brought word to Sparta, that Ariftemus was returned home, their tale sounded alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was revived. But when

when the Corinthian forces that came to help the Lacedæmonians in the siege of Era, were cut in pieces, their Captains finding their Camp taken, yet then it easily believed, that Ariftemus was alive indeed.

Ten eleven years passed whilst the enemies hovering about Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Ariftemus with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slave that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lowliness the wife of a Meſſenian, and was entertained by her, when her Husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainy-winter night, that the Husband came home unlooked for, whilst the Adulterer was within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him by what good fortune he was returned so soon. He told her, that the storm of foul weather was such, as had made all his fellows leave their stations, and that himself had done as the rest did; as for Ariftemus, he was wounded of late in fight and could not look abroad, neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would stir in such a dark rainy night as this was. This slave that heard these tidings, rose up secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedæmonian Camp with this news. There he found Emperamus his Master commanding in the Kings absence. To him he uttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Army into the Town. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Alarm was presently taken; and the extreme darkness, together with the noise of wind and rain, hindered all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruel fights; one part being incited by meer hope ending a long work, the other enraged by meer desperation. The great advantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompensed partly by the assistance which women and children (to whom the hatred of servitude had taught contempt of death) gave to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrowness of the streets and other passages, which admitted not many to fight at once. But the Meſſenians were in continual toyl; their enemies fought in confusion, refreshing themselves with meat and sleep, and then returning supplied the place of their weary fellows with fresh Companions. Ariftemus therefore, perceiving that his men for want of relief were no longer able to hold out, (as having been three days and three nights vexed with all manner of labours, watching, fighting, hunger and thirst, besides continual rain and cold) gathered together all the weaker sort, whom he compassed about with armed men, and so attempted to break out through the midst of the Enemies. Emperamus General of the Lacedæmonians was glad of this; and to further their departure, caused his Soldiers to give an open way, leaving a fair passage to these desperate mad men. So they issued forth and arrived safe in Aradia, where they were most lovingly entertained.

Upon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themselves to the rescue: but Ariftrates their false hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was already lost. When Ariftemus had placed his followers in safety, he chose out five hundred the lustiest of his men, with whom he resolved to march in all secret haste into Sparta, hoping to find the Town secure, and ill manned, the people being run forth to the spoil of Meſſene. In this enterprise, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedæmonians would be glad to recover their own. By sedition of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to join with him; but Ariftrates murred all, by sending speedy advertisement thereof to Antaxander King of Sparta. The Errand which Antaxander sent back to Ariftrates was intercepted by some that mistook him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falsehood, which being published in open assembly, the Arcadians stoned him to death, and casting Era his body unburied, erected a monument of his treachery, with a note, That the Perjuror cannot deceive God.

Of Ariftemus no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his people, to the charge of his son Gorgus and other sufficient Governors, who should plant them in some new fair abroad, he resolved himself to make abroad in those parts, hoping to find the Lacedæmonians weak at home. His daughters he bestowed honourably in marriage. One of them, Demagene, who reigned in the life of Rhodes, took to wife being willed by an Oracle, to marry the Daughter of the best man in Greece. Finally Ariftemus went with his daughter to Rhodes, when he purposed to have travelled unto Arady the Son of Cyges King of Lydia, and to Pharantes King of Media; but death prevented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Meſſenians were invited by Anaxila (whose great Grandfather was a Meſſenian, and went into Italy after the former War) being Lord of the Rhegium in Italy, to take his part against the Zancleans in Sicily, on the other side of the Strait. They did so; and winning the Town of Zancle, called it Meſſene, which name it keeps to this day.

This second Meſſenian War ended in the first year of the twenty eighth Olympiad. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home served the Lacedæmonians, found means to rebel; but were soon vanquished, and being driven to forsake Poloponnesus, they went into Acarnania, whence likewise, after few ages, they were expelled by the Lacedæmonians, and thence followed their ancient Country-men into Italy and Sicily; some of them went into Africa, where they chose unto themselves a seat.

It is very strange, that during two hundred and fourscore years, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customs, language, hatred of Sparta, and love of their forsaken Country; with a desire to return unto it. In the third year of the hundred and second Olympiad, the great Epaminondas, having tamed the pride of the Lacedæmonians, revoked the Meſſenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Poloponnesus. There did Epaminondas restore unto them their old possession, and help them in building a fair City; which by the name of the Province, was called Meſſene, and was held by them ever after, in despite of the Lacedæmonians, of whom they never from thenceforth stood in fear.

SECT. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while Manasses reigned. Whether Deceos the Mede, were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Book of Judith. Of the History of Judith.

Ardy King of Lydia, and Pharantes of the Medes, are spoken of by Paulus, as reigning shortly after the Meſſenian war, Arady succeeding unto his father, father Oger, began his reign of nine and forty years, in the second of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his Father, who encroached upon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardis was Prinus, and assailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his reign the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their own country by the Scythians, over-ran a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grand-child, by whom they were driven out. They had not only broken into Lydia, but won the City of Sardis; though the Callie or Citadel thereof was defended against them and held till for King Ardis whose long reign was unable, by reason of this great form, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King until the third year of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was six years after the Median war ended; the same being the last years of Manasses his reign over Juda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fifty of these five and fifty years, in which Manasses reigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict form, commanding more absolutely than his Predecessors had done.

For this, following the example of Arbaers, had given to the people so much licence, as caused every one to desire the whellom freeness of a more Lordly King. Herin Deioces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he took unto him a Guard; for the defence of his person; he seldom gave presence; which also when he did, it was with such austerity, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awful regard; and highly upheld the Majesty which his Predecessors had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royal office, he did uprightly and severely administer justice, keeping secret spies to inform him of all that was done in the Kingdom. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching upon others, but studied how to govern well his own. The difference found between this King, and such as were before him, seems to have bred that opinion which Herodotus delivers, that Deioces was the first who reigned in Media.

This was he that built the great City of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the story of Judith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same account, should be Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slain, and Holofernes sent to work wonders upon Phul and Lud, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last year of Deioces to have been the nineteenth of Ben Merodach: though others place it otherwise, some earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the reign of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In fitting this book of Judith to a certain time, there hath been much labour spent with ill success. The reigns of Cambyses, Darius, Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, have been sought into, but afford no great matter of likelihood; and now of late, the times foregoing the destruction of Jerusalem, have been thought upon, and this age that we have in hand, chosen by Bellarmino, as agreeing best with the story; though others herein cannot (I speak of such as I mean) agree with him. Whilst Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not re-built, which in the story of Judith is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes, are acknowledged to have been very favourable to the Jews; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conveniences, apply fitting this History; and above all, the opinion of a few ancient Writers (without whose judgment the authority of this Book were of no value) having placed this argument in the Persian Monarchy, inclines the matter to the reign of this vain-glorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the business. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this History, there must be a return from captivity lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Joaquin High Priest; and a long peace of three or ten years, or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Jews. Likewise on the other side, we must find a King that reigned in Nineve, eighteen years at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Jews related to assist; one, that sought generally to be adored as God, and that therefore commanded all Temples, of such as were accounted Gods, to be destroyed; one, whose Viceroy or Captain General knew not the Jewish Nation, but was fain to learn what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances; the Priesthood of Joaquin, with a return from captivity, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Jerusalem, or of Xerxes afterward; the re-building of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the reign of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before nor after the captivity of the Jews, and destruction of the City. Wherefore the decision of this controversy is, That the Book of Judith is not Canonical. Yet hath Tornilius done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that under Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one, (who perhaps restored and re-edified the City of Ecbatane, that had formerly been built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted; he adds, that from the twelfth year to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is five or six years, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes in his Grecian expedition (which he supposeth to have been so long) might give occasion unto Arphaxad, of rebelling; and that Nabuchodonosor, having vanquished and slain Arphaxad, might then seek to make himself Lord of all, by the Army, which he sent forth unto Holofernes. So should the Jews have done their duty, in adding to Xerxes their Sovereign Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applied to the argument. For in their times, the affairs of Jery King were agreeable to the History of Judith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough beignorant of the Jews, and as proud as we shall need to think him. But the silence of all Histories, takes away belief from this conjecture; and the supposition it self is very hard, that a Rebel, whose King was abroad, with an Army consisting of seventeen hundred thousand men, should presume so far, upon the strength of twelve hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand Archers on horse-back, as to think that he might do what he list, yet that there was none other God than himself. It is indeed easy to find enough that might be said against this device of Tornilius; yet if there were any necessity of holding the book of Judith to be Canonical, I would would rather chuse to lay aside all regard of probability, and build more defence upon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all do, the text it self. That Judith lived under none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmino (whose works I have not read, but find him cited by Tornilius) hath proved by many arguments. That the lived not in the Reign of Manasses, Tornilius hath proved very substantially, shewing how the Cardinal is driven, as it were to break through a wall, in saying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time, that the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, found out by Tornilius, are the children of meer fable; it is plain that it needs no proof at all.

Wherefore we may truly say, that they, which have contended about the time of this History, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stony field) have chased Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him in his great expedition, Extra anni solisque vias, in an age that never was, and in places that were never known.

Surely, to find out the borders of Japheth, which were towards the South, and over against Arabia: to see the Countries of Phul and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I think it would as much trouble Chronographers, as the former question hath done Geographers. But I will not trouble my self here-with; having already so far directed, in shewing who lived not with Manasses; that I think it high time to return unto mine own work, and rehearse what Others I find to have had their part, in the long time of his Reign.

SECT. VI.

Of other Princes and Actions that were in these times.

THE first year of Manasses was the last of Romulus; after whose death, one year the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius, a Sabine chosen, a peaceable man, and seeming very religious in his kind. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed only in Wars, to some good civility, and more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with Superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiarity with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him many Ceremonies which he delivered unto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these devices of Numa were in his own judgement, no matter then meer delusions, that served only as rudiments to bring the savage multitude of thieves and out-laws, gathered into one body by Romulus, to some form of milder discipline, than their boyish and wild natures were otherwise apt to entertain. This appeared by the Books that were found in his grave, almost six hundred years after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himself was condemned as vain. His Grave was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffins or Chests of stone were in it, with an inscription in Greek and Latine letters, which said, that Numa Pompilius, the Son of Pompilius, King of the Romans lay there. In the one coffin was nothing found; his body being utterly consumed. In the other were his Books, wrapped up in two bundles of wax; of his own constitutions seven, and other seven of Philosophy. They were not only uncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretor of the City desiring to have a sight of these Books, when he perceived whereunto they tended, refused to deliver them back to the owner, and offered to take a solemn Oath that they were against the Religion then in use. Hereupon the Senate, without more ado, commanded them to be openly burnt. It seems that Numa did mean to acquit himself unto wiser Ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not been so foolish as to believe the Doctrines wherein he instructed his own barbarous times. But the poison wherewith he had infected Rome, when he fate in his Throne, had not left working, when he mislaid the Antidote out of his Grave. Had these books not come to light until the days of Tully and Cesar, when the mist of ignorance was somewhat better diffused: likely it is, that they had not only escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peradventure general) effect. Being as it was, they served as a consultation, without remedy, of Idolatry that was inveterate.

Numa reigned three and forty years in continual peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the six and fortieth of Manasses, and reigned two and thirty years, buifed, for the most part, in war. He quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field, but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cause to fear, that might grow unto them from the Tuscanes, caused them to be think themselves of a cowardly whereby without effusion of too much blood, as might make them too weak for a common enemy, it might be decided, who should command, and who obey.

There were in each Camp three Brethren, Twins, born at one birth (Dionysius says that they were Cousin Germans) of equal years and strength, who were appointed to fight for their several Counties. The end was, that the Horatii, Companions for the Romans, got the victory, though two of them first lost their lives. The three Curiatii that fought for Alba (as Livy tells it) were all alive, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slain; but the third Horatius, pretending fear, did run away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts, could not follow him with equal speed, to follow him at such a distance one from another, that returning upon them, he slew them, as it had been in single fight, man after man, ere they could join together and set upon him once. Dionysius reports it somewhat otherwise, telling very particularly what wounds were given and taken, and saying, that first, one of the Horatii was slain, then, one of the Curiatii, then, a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curiatii, whom the third Horatius, did cunningly sever the one from the other, as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman History, both in regard of the action it self, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in a wager, against Alba; and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the City of Alba did immediately become subject unto her own Colony, and was shortly after, upon some treacherous dealing of their Governor, utterly razed, the people being removed unto Rome where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latians, wherof Alba, as the mother City, had been chief, became ere long dependent upon Rome, though not subject unto it, and divers petty States adjacent, were by little and little taken in; which additions, that were final, yet many, I will forbear to rehearse (as being the work of sundry ages, and and few of them remarkable considered apart by themselves) until such time as the fourth Empire, that is now in the Infancy, shall grow to be the main subject of this History.

The seventh year of Hippomenes in Athenes was current with the fifth of Manasse. About the three last Governors for ten years, who followed Hippomenes, were in the fame Kings time. Of these I find only names Locrates, Alxander, and Erizias. After Erizias yearly Rulers were elected.

These Governors for ten years were also of the race of Medon and Cadmus, but their time of rule was shortened, and from term of life reduced unto ten years, it being thought likely that they would govern the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to live private men under the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times unto those years of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronological Table, following this work, doth set them. For he not only professeth himself to have taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times: but hath noted always the years of the Greeks, how they did answer unto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this History. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the fifth year of the seventh Olympiad, and affirms, that the fame was the first year of Charops's government of Athenes; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who first the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

In the reign of Manasse it was that Midus, whom the Poets feigned to have had Atlas ears, held the Kingdom of Phrygia. Many fables were devised of him: especially that he should touch might immediately be changed into Gold: by which means he had like to have been starved (if meat and drink being subject to the same transformation) had not Bacchus delivered him from that miserable faculty, by causing him to walk himself in the River Pactolus, the stream whereof hath ever since, forthwith, abounded in that precious metall. Finally, it is said he dyed by drinking Bulls blood: being invaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who fifth Plutarch in the life of Romulus observed the Moons Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milvians, or, (as Enschius hath it) the Athenians having obtained some power by Sea, founded Macerin a City on the East of Egypt. Plamiticus herein seems to have assisted them, who used all means of drawing the Greeks into Egypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus nor Athenes were of power sufficient to plant a Colony in Egypt by force.

About this time Archias and his companion Plot, Stellus, and other Corinthians, founded Syracuse in Sicily. A City in after times exceeding famous.

The City of Nicomachus, sometime * Alacus, * Whence it was enlarged and beautified in this age, by Zipartes, a native of Thrace. * Syllis of Samos, according to Pausanias, lived much about this time.

About these times also was Criton founded upon part of the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracuse. Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient, and so doth Pausanias.

About the same time the Parthenians being of age, and banished Lacedemon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italy; where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Jysius and Pausanias find it built before, and by them conquered and amplified. And about the same time, Manasse yet living, the City Phasolis was founded in Pamphylia, Cela in Sicily, Interamne in the Region of the Umbria, now Orbin in Italy. About which time also Chalcidon in Asia, over against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenses, who therefore were upbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long work to rehearse all that is said to have been done in the five and fifty years of Manasse: that which already hath been told is enough, the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, reserving only Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the business that will shortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the Times from the death of MANASSES, to the Destruction of Jerusalem.

SECT. I.

OF AMMON and JOSIAS.

AMMON the Son of Manasse, a man no less wicked than was his Father before his conversion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatry: for which God hardened the hearts of his own servants against him, who slew him after he had reigned two years. Philo, Enschius, and Nicephorus give him ten years, following the Septuagint.

Josias succeeded unto Ammon, being but a child of 8 years old, he began to seek after the God of David his Father's: and in his twelfth year he purged Juda, and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved and molten Images: and they brake down in his fight the Altars of Baalim: He caused all the Images, as well those which were graven, as molten, to be stamped to powder, and strewed on their graves that had erected them: and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. He also flew those that sacrificed to the Sun and Moon, and caused the Chariots and Horses of the Sun to be burnt. Of Josias was prophesied in the time of Jeroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calt at Bethel: that a child should be born unto the house of David, Josias by name, and upon thence (said the Prophet, speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burn incense upon thee: a prophecy very remarkable.

In the eighteenth year of his reign, he re-built and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Priest, found the Book of Moses, called Deuteronomy, or, of the Law, which he sent to the King: which when he had caused to be read before him, and considered of the severe commandments therein written, the prosperity promised to those that observe them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to ask counsel of the Prophets Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Book: who answered the messengers in these words: Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring evil upon the place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curses that are written in the Book, which they have read before the King of Juda, because they have forsaken me, and have not kept my Commandments. Only for the King himself, because he was a lover of God and his laws, it was promised that this evil should not fall on Juda and Jerusalem in his days, but that he himself should inherit his grave in peace.

Josias assembled the Elders, caused the Book to be read unto them, made a Covenant with the Lords, and caused all that were found in Jerusalem and Benjamin to do the like, promising thereby to observe the Laws and Commandments in the Book contained.

The execution done by Josias upon the Altar, Idols, Monuments, and Bones of the false Prophets at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to have extended unto those Countries, that had been part of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Yet I do not think, that any victory of Josias in war got possession of these places; but rather that Ezechias, after the flight and death of Sennacherib, when Merodach opposed himself against Assurhaddon, did use the advantage which the faction in the North presented unto him, and laid hold upon so much of the Kingdom of Israel, as he was able to people. Otherwife also it is not improbable that the Babylonians finding himself unable to deal with Psammetichus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of Azotus, though the Town held out nine and twenty years) did give unto Manasse, together with his liberty, as much in Israel as himself could not easily defend. This was a good way to break the amity that the Kings of Juda had so long held with those of Egypt, by causing a bone between them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territories with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeem the friendship of the Jews, which had been lost by injuries done in seeking to bereave them of their own. When it is said, that Manasse did after his deliverance from imprisonment, put Captains of War in all the strong Cities of Juda; it may be that some such business is intimated, as the taking possession and fortifying of places delivered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he took much pains, in making Jerusalem it self more defensible; yet I should rather believe, that he, having already compounded with the Babylonians, did fortifie himself against the Egyptians, whose side he had forsaken, than that he travelled in making such provision only for his minds sake. The earnestness of Josias in the taking of Bethel, doth argue, that the composition wth Manasse had made with that King, or his Ancestor, was upon friendly terms, as required not only a faithful observance but a thankful requital. For no persuasions could suffice to make Josias sit still, and hold himself quiet in good neutrality, when Pharao Necho King of Egypt pulled along by him, to war upon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

The last year of Josias his reign it was, when as Necho the Son of Psammetichus, came with a powerful Army towards the border of Judea, determining to pass that way, being the nearest towards Euphrates, either to strengthen the passages of that River about Carchemish, or Circassium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Dionysius is said by Ammianus ^{1 Chron. 31} Marcellinus to have done,) or perhaps to invade ²⁰ Syria it self. For it seemeth that the travail of Psammetichus was not been idly consumed about that one Town of Azotus, but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters that had formerly belonged unto the Addees Kings of Damascus.

Neither was the industry of Necho less than his Fathers had been, in pursuing their War against Babel. In which war, two things may greatly have availed the Egyptians, and advanced their affairs and hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenary Greeks, that were far better Souldiers than Egypt of it self could afford; and the danger wherein Affir stood, by the force of the Medes, which under the command of more absolute Princes, began to feel it self better, and to shew what it could do. These were great helps, but of shorter endurance than was the war: as in a place more convenient shall be noted. At the present it seems that either some preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disability of theirs to make resistance, did invite the King of Egypt into the Countries bordering upon Euphrates: whither Pharao Necho descended with a mighty Army.

These two great Monarchs, having their Swords drawn, and contending for the Empire of that part of the world, Josias advised with himself to which of these he might adhere, having his Territory left in the mid way between both, so as the one could not invade the other, but that they must of necessity tread upon the very face and body of his Country. Now though it were so that Necho himself desired, by his Embassadors, leave to pass along by Judea, protesting that he directed himself against the Affir only, without all harmful purpose against Josias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had assistance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he felt the dependance of the Affir, and wholly trusted to Sabacus or Sons King of Egypt, was utterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Affir for rooted up and rare in pieces, as it could never after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell upon Juda in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of Ezechias, whilst that good King and his people relied upon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasse, were documents of sufficient proof, to shew the ill assurance that was in the help of the Egyptians, who (near neighbours though they were) were always unready, when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seek to have the Jews renew their ancient league with him, but only craved that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pasture between him and the Affir. This was an easy title to grant: seeing the countenance of such an Army, as did soon after this, our face Nabulassar upon his own borders, left unto the Jews, a lawful excuse of fear, that they forbore to give it any check upon the way. Wherefore I believe that this religious and virtuous Prince Josias, was not stirred up only by politic respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himself bound in Faith and Honour, to do his best in defence of the Babylonian Crown: whereunto his Kingdom was obliged, either by Covenant made at the enlargement of Manasse, or by the gift of such part as he held in the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Juda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both unto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians, what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemy.

Some think that this Action of Josias was contrary to the advice of Jeremy the Prophet: which I do not find in the Prophecy of Jeremy, nor can find reason to believe. Others hold opinion that he forgot to ask the Council of God: and this is very likely; seeing he might believe that an enterprise grounded upon fidelity and thankfulness due to the King of Babel could not but be displeasing unto the Lord. But the wickedness of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such root, as all the care of Josias in reclaiming the Land could not pluck up) was questionable far from hearkening how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined that their good King, whose life stood between them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should give an entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Josias levying all the strength he could make, near unto Megidda, in the last tribe of Manasse, encountered Neco: and there he received the stroke of death, which lingering about him till he came to Jerusalem, brought him to the Sepulchres of his Ancestors. His loss was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Juda, especially of Jeremy the Prophet, who inferred a sorrowful remembrance thereof in his Book of Lamentations.

SECT. II.

Of Pharaoh Neco that fought with Josias: Of Jehoahaz and Jehoakim Kings of IC
rael.

OF these Wars, and particularly of this Victory, Herodotus hath mention among the Acts of Neco. He tells us of this King, that he went about to make a Channel, whereby Ships might pass out of Nileus into the Red Sea. It should have reached above an hundred miles in length, and been wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the midst of the work, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should have the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desert when half was done. There were consumed in this toylsome business twelve hundred thousand Egyptians; a loss great enough to make the King forsake his enterprise, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howsoever it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore he built a Fleet, and levied a great Army, wherewith he marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition, he used the service as well of his Navy, as of his Land forces; but no particular exploits of his therein are found recorded, save only this victory: against Josias, where Herodotus calls the place Megidolus, and the Jews Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Juda was a Province of Syria, and Megidolus or Magdala is taken to have been the battle place (though diversely named) in which this battle was fought. After this, Neco took the City of Cadish, which was perhaps Charchemish, by Espharates, and made himself Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Josaphat witnesseth.

Particularly we find, that the Phenicians one of the most powerful Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they surrounded all Africa, setting sail from the Gulf of Arabia, and so passing along all the coast, whereto they both landed, as need required, and sowed Corn for their sustenance in that long voyage, which lasted three years. This was the first Navigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called Of good hope, was discovered; which after was forgotten, until Vasco de Gama the Portingalese found it out, following a contrary course to that which the Phenicians held; for they beginning in the East, ran the way of the Sun, South, and then Westward, after which they returned homely by the pillars and freights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the freights of Gibraltar, having Africa still on the right hand; but the Portingalese, beginning their voyage not far from the same freights, leave Africa on the Larboard, and bend their Course unto the East. That report of the Phenicians, which Herodotus durst not believe, how the Sun in this journey was on their right hand, that is on the North side of them, is a matter of necessity truth; and the observation then made is so, makes me the better to believe, that such a voyage was indeed performed. But leaving these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let us tell what he did, in matters more importing his state. The people of Juda, while the Egyptians were busy at Charchemish, had made Jehoahaz their King, in the room of his Father Josiah. The Prophet Jeremy calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; allying perhaps to the short reign of Shallum King of the ten tribes: for Shallum of Israel reigned but one month; Jehoahaz no more than three. He was not the eldest Son of Josias: Wherefore it may seem that he was set up as the best affected unto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the Egyptians, as appears by the sequel. For when Neco later he was, and thrived accordingly. For when Neco had dispatched his business in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affairs of Juda. This Country was now so far from making any resistance, that the King himself came from Riblah in the Land of Hamath, where the matter went to ill on his side, that Neco did cast him into bonds, and carry him prisoner unto Egypt, giving away his Kingdom to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. The City of Riblah, in after times called Amnicolia, was a place unhappy to the Kings and Princes of Juda, as may be observed in divers examples. Yet here Jehoakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdom; an ill gift, since he could no better use it. But however Jehoakim thrived by the bargain, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdom Tributary, without any stroke of sword; which three months before was to stout to give him peace, when he desired it. Certain it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater task lying upon his hands, than would permit him to wait his forces upon Juda: but now the reputation of his good success at Megidda, and Charchemish, together with the diffidence of the Princes Josias his Sons (of whom the eldest is probably thought to have flourished at the prement of his younger brother) gave him power to do even what should please himself. Yet he did forbear to make a conquest of the Land, perhaps upon the same reason, which had made him so earnest in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Jews had suffered much in the Egyptian quarrel, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, unto all extremities, were driven of necessity to forsake that party, and to join with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselves faithful, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaim them: seeing they were such a people as would not upon every occasion shift side, but endure more than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay upon them: so good a Patron did he mean to be unto them. Nevertheless, he laid upon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of Silver, and one Talent of Gold; that so he might both reap at present some fruits of his pains taken, and leave unto them some document in the future, of greater punishment than verbal anger, due to them, if they should rebel. So he departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the unfortunate King Jehoahaz, who died in his Captivity.

The reign of Jehoahaz was included in the end of his Fathers last year; otherwise it would hardly be found, that Jehoakim his Successor did reign ten whole years; whereas the Scriptures give him eleven years, that are current and incomplete. If any man will rather call the three months of this short reign, unto the first year of his brother, than into the Fathers last, the same arguments that shall maintain his opinion, will also prove the matter to be unworthy of dispute; and so I leave it.

Jehoakim in impiety was like his Brother, in faction he was altogether Egyptian, as having received his Crown at the hand of Pharao. The wickedness of these last Kings being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by general words with reference to all the evil their Fathers had done, makes it apparent, that the poison wherewith Ahaz and Manasse had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodness of Josias, but that it still cleaved unto the chief of the people. Yes, unto the Priests also; and therefore it was not strange, that the Kings had their parts therein. The Royal authority was much abused by the dangers wherein the Country stood, in this troublesome age: the Princes did in a manner what they listed, neither would the Kings forbear to profess, that they could deny them nothing. Yet the beginning of Jehoakim had the countenance of the Egyptians to grace it, which made him insolent and cruel; as we find by that example of his dealing with Urias the Prophet: though herein also the Princes do appear to have been Infligators. This holy man denounced Gods judgments against the City and Temple, in like sort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did it in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poor man fled into Egypt: but such regard was had to Jehoakim, that Urias was delivered unto his Embassador, and sent back to the death: contrary to the custom used, both in those days, and since among all civil Nations, of giving refuge unto strangers, that are not held guilty of such inhumane crimes, as for the general good of mankind should be exempted from all privilege.

It concerned Pharao to give all contentment possible to Jehoakim; for the Affirrian Lion, that had not stirred in many years, began about these times to roar so loud upon the banks of Euphrates, that his voice was heard unto Nileus, threatening to make himself Lord of all the Forfeit. The quies that hitherto had withheld from the house of Merodach from opposing the Egyptian in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place, before we proceed to commit them together at Charchemish, where shortly after this the glory of Egyptus is to fall.

SECT. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to pass that the Kings of Babel could not give attendance on their business in Syria; which caused them to lose that Province.

Merodach the Son of Baladan, who taking the Advantage that Sennacherib's misadventure and death, together with the diffidence between his children, presented, made himself King of Babylon, was eleven years troubled with a powerful Enemy, Asharaddon the Son of Sennacherib, reigning over the Affirians in Nineve; from whom whilst he could not any other way divert his cares, he was fain to omit all business in Syria, and (as hath been formerly shewed) to make over unto Ezechias some part of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Asharaddon did not only let him free, but gave unto him some part of Affiria, if not (as is commonly, but less probably thought) the whole Kingdom. How greatly this was the liking of the Affirians, I will not here stand to enquire; his long reign following, and his little intermeddling with the matters of Syria, make it plain, that he had work enough at home, either in defending, or establishing that which he had gotten. Josaphat gives him the honour of having won Nineve itself which we may believe; but surely he did not hold it long. For in the times long following, that great City was free, and vanquished Pharao the Median. Perhaps it yielded upon some capitulation; and refused afterwards to continue subject, when the Kings, being of the Chaldean race preferred Babylon before it.

Some think that this was the Affirrian King, whose Captains took Manasse prisoner, but I rather believe those that held the contrary, for which I have given my reasons in due place. To say truth, I find little cause why Merodach should have looked into those parts, as long as the Jews were his friends, and the Egyptians, that malign'd the Northern Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was until the time of Ptolemy, about the end of this Kings Reign, or the beginning of his Sons.

Ber Merodach the Son and successor of his King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is he named by good consent of Authors, and that speak little of his doings. The length of his Reign is gathered by inference to have been one and twenty years; for so much remaneth of the time that passed between the beginning of his Fathers and Nephews reign (which is a known sum) deducting the years of his Father, and of his Son Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that Manasse prisoner, and released him. He spent all in Syria, where Jeremias, by the virtue of his mercenary Greek, did much prevail. This may have been some cause that he released Manasse, and did put into his hands some part more of the Kingdom of Samaria: which is made probable by circumstances alleged before.

Nabulassar that reigned in Babylon after his Father Ben Merodach, had greater business in his own Kingdom, than would 'ermit him to look abroad: inasmuch as it may be thought to have been a great negligence or oversight of Psammetichus or Neco, that they did not occupy some good part of his Dominions beyond Emphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes invaded Affria, and besieged Nineve; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remove by the coming of the Scythians, who in treacheries did overflow those parts of the world, laying hold upon all that they could master with strong hand. Of these Scythians, and the Lordship they held in Asia, it is convenient that I speak in this places shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, upon whom they first fell, were buffed in the same times with hopes of conquering Affria.

Phraortes, the son of Deioeces, King of the Medes, having by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceived at length a fair possibility of making himself Lord of Nineve.

Herod. 1. That City (as Herodotus reports it) having been a Sovereign Lady was not forsaken of all her dependants, yet remained in such case, that she felt the war was well enough.

This makes it plain, that howsoever Merodach had gotten possession of this Imperial seat, and made it (subject) as was the rest of the Country, yet it found the means to let it self at liberty: as after this again it did, when it had been regained by Nabulassar his Grand-child.

Sharp war, and the very novelty of sudden violence, use to dismay any State or Country, not insured to the like: but custom of danger hardeneth even those that are unwarlike. Nineve had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; it had suffered, and refilled, all the fury, wherewith either Domestical Tumults between the Sons of Sen-nachib, or foreign war of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the less wonderful, that Phraortes did speed so ill in his journey against it. He and the most of his Army perished in that expedition: wherof I find no particular circumstances (perhaps they undervalued their forces, and brought a less power than was needful.) It is enough, that herein we may believe Herodotus.

Cyaxares the Son of Phraortes, a braver man of War than his Father, was as much of Asia the Iels, as lay Eastward, from the River of Halys: he fought revenge upon the Affrians for the death of his Father, and besieged Nineve in self, having a purpose to destroy it. I rather believe Eusebius, that he took the City, and he fulfilled his displeasure upon it, than Herodotus, that the Scythian Army came upon him while he lay before it. For where equal authorities are contradictory (as Eusebius, though far later than Herodotus, yet having seen other Authors that are now lost, it is to be valued according to his great reading) there do I hold it best, to yield unto the best likelihoods.

To think that the Scythians came upon Cyaxares, whilst he lay before Nineve, were to accuse him of greater providence than ought to be suspected in one commended as a good Soldier. But to suppose that he was fain to leave the Town, when a War so dangerous fell upon his own Country, doth well agree both with the condition of such business as that Scythian expedition brought into those parts, and with the State of the Chaldean and Affrian affairs ensuing.

The destruction of this great City is both foretold in the Book of Tobit, and there set down as happening about these times; of which Book who-soever was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the story of those ages, and hath committed no such error in reckoning of times, as should cause us to distrust him in this. As for the Prophecy of Nabum, though it be not limited unto any certain terms, yet it appears to have taken effect, in the final destruction of Nineve by Nabuchodonosor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a conquest of Egypt, foregoing this calamity, wherof we will speak in due place. Some that ascribe more authority than the reformed Churches yield, to the Book of Tobit, are careful, as in a matter of necessity, to affirm that about these times, Nineve was taken: but they attribute (conjecturally) the victory over it to Ben Merodach: a needless conjecture, if the place of Eusebius be well considered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulassar the son of Ben Merodach did seize upon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about such time as the Country of Affria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian War overwhelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought out ready to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Ninevites were calmed, and their malice to Babylon so much abated, that it might be thought a great favour, if Nabulassar, appointing unto them a peculiar King, took him and them in protection: though afterwards to their confusion, this unthankful people and their King rebelled again, as shall be shewed in the Reign of Nabuchodonosor.

SECT. IV.

The great expedition of the Scythians, wherof led in Asia eight and twenty years.

II.

The time of this Expedition.

NOW that I have shewed what impediment was given by the Affrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much disabled to perform any action of worth upon the Egyptians in Syria: it is time that I speak of that great Scythian expedition, which grievously afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians with the Countries adjacent, in such wise, that part of the trouble redounded even to the Egyptians themselves.

Of the Scythian people in general, Herodotus makes very large discourse; but interlaced, as of matter ill known, with many Fables; of this Expedition he tells many particulars, but ill agreeing with consent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needless to rectify them; for they are far enough distant from the business in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may seem very strange, needeth some answer in this place: lest otherwise, I should either seem to make my self too bold with an Author, in citing him after a manner different from his own tale; or else to be too forgetful of my self, in bringing to light upon the Stage, those persons, which I had already buried. Eight and twenty years, he saith, that the Scythians reigned in Asia, before Cyaxares delivered the Country from them. Yet he reports a War

War

War between Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the siege of Nineve; the siege of Nineve being ere the Scythians came.

And further he tells how the Scythians having vanquished the Medes, did pass into Syria, and were encountered in Palatina by Psammetichus King of Egypt, who by gifts and intreaty procured them to depart from him. These narrations of Herodotus may, every one of us, be true; though not in such order of time, as he hath marshalled them. For Psammetichus was dead before Cyaxares began to reign: and Cyaxares had spent half of his forty years, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia, so that he could not after those Lydian Wars, reign eight and twenty years together with the Scythians. It is true, that Eusebius doth also call Psammetichus the son of Pharao Neco, by the name of Psammetichus: a needless King Pammetichus may, by some strained conjecture, be thought to have been he that met with the Scythians: for he lived with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Eusebius himself refers all that business of the Scythian irruption into Palatina to Psammetichus the Father of Neco, whom he leaves dead before the reign of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not rely upon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise than to believe him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them down.

It remains, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I find of this Expedition scattered in divers places: a work necessary, that the greatness of this action was such, as ought not to be omitted in general History; yet not easy, the consent of those that have written thereof, being nothing near to uniformity.

I have noted before, that in the reign of Ardis King of Lydia, the Cimmerians over-ran that Kingdom, and were not expelled, until Halyattes the Nephew of Ardis got the upper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardis, Sardiates, and Hal-lites, are we to find the eight and twenty years, wherein the Scythians reigned over Asia. Now so far as Psammetichus the Egyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, even in the height of their prosperity, we must needs allow more than one or two of his last years into this their Dominion: But the beginning of Halyattes his reign in Lydia, being twice and twenty years complete after the death of Psammetichus, leaves the space very scant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meet the Egyptians in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must have received ere they could be driven quite away.

To encrease this difficulty, the victorious reign of Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For now may we think it possible, that he should have adventured the strength of the Kingdom against the Egyptians and Trois, had he stood in daily fear of looting his own more mighty Nation, that lay upon his neck? To speak simply as it appears to me, the victories ascribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes over these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole body of their Army, but were the defeaters of some troops that invetted their several Kingdoms: other Princes, and among these Nabulassar having the like success, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardy Northern Lads. Wherefore we may probably annex the eight and twenty years of the Scythian rule, to as many almost the half of Nabulassar's Reign, in compass wherof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of their oppressors.

II.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia with the cause of their Journey.

TouChing the expedition it self, Herodotus tells us, that the Cimmerians being driven out of their Country by the Scythians, invaded and wasted some part of Asia; and that the Scythians, not contented with having won the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them. I know not why, into far removed quarters of the World, so (as it were by chance) falling upon Media and Egypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Scythians, as mischievous and foolish; or else Herodotus, and some other of his Country-men, great flandersers of those, by whom their Nation had been beaten, and Ionis, more than once, grievously ranfack. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well known, and their many Conquests so well testified in Histories of divers Nations, that the malice of the Greeks is insufficient to stain them with the note of Cowards: These were the posterity of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Western World; and whose religion did overwhelm no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age wherof we do now treat. He that would more largely inform himself of their original and actions may peruse Gorgopius Becanus his Amazonica, of many things in which Book, that may be verified, which the learned Orellius is said to have spoken of all Gorgopius his works, that it is easy to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There where it proved, by large arguments and authorities as are not lightly regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians, and Sarmatians, were all of one Lineage and Nation; howsoever distinguished in name, by reason of their divers tribes, professions, or perhaps Dialect of speech. Homér indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Country whether he places in the West, as near unto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being far from the Sun, and covered with eternal darkness, certain it is that he would have them near neighbours to Hell: for he had the same quarrel to them which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would have made them seem a kind of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to infect into his Works the names of such as lived in his own time, making such mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himself deserved. And for this reason it is proved by Eusebius, that the Cimmerians were so disgraced by him, because they had wasted his Country. Perhaps that invasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, wherof Homér puts a remembrance into Primus his discourse with Helen, was the very fame, which Eusebius noeth to have happened somewhat before the age of Homér, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together invaded Asia.

This is certain, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerii (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often break into Greece and Asia; which though it be not in expresse terms written, that they did with joint forces, yet seeing they invaded the self-same places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One journey of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the streights of the Cimmerians, as we find in Diodore, who who further telleth us, that the Scythians therein gave them all this. The same Author, before his entry into those discourses of the Amazons, which himself acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to have been Wives of the Scythians, and no less War-like than their Husbands; alledging the example of that Queen who is said to have slain the great Perſus Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their Wives along with them in the wars; and how desperate the courage was of those Women's terrible descent of them into Italy, when Marius the Roman overthrew them, gives proof sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; another place will give me better leisure to speak of them: but seeing that they are noted by divers Historians to have belonged unto the Cimmerians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better approve Sorapheus his conclusion, That these three Nations were one, at least that they were near allies.

Now as concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to have been none other than the landing forth a Colony of them into Asia, with an Army of Scythians to help them in purchasing a new seat and establishing the Plantation. The Sarmatians also were compaſſious in this journey. For the City of Novograd in Russia (which Country is the same that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way homewards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was up in Arms; and therefore it is no marvel though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the same people made five hundred years and more after this, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Mæotis; they were then likewise assisted (saith Plutarch in the most like report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their Army above three hundred thousand fighting men, besides a huge multitude of women and children's they wandered over many Countries, beating all down before them; and finally, thinking to have settled themselves in Italy, they divided their Company, for the more easy passage thither, and were consumed in three terrible battles by the Roman Consuls. Meer necessity enforced these poor Nations to trouble the World, in following fruitfull of men by far than of succulence, and that shup on the North side with intollerable cold, which denied issue that way to their overwelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge upon the South, and by right or wrong to drive others out of possession, as having title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker but more civil, people had. Their sturdy bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardships, gave them great advantage over such as were accustomed unto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thousand superfluities. Wherefore most commonly they prevailed very far, their next neighbours giving them free passage, that they might the sooner be rid of them: others giving them, besides passage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthy places; others hiring them to depart with great presents: it was the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, & the more comfortable people.

§. III.

Of the Cimmerians War in Lydia.

The first Company of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand; leaving on the other side, and behind them, the great Mountains of Caucasus. Thence having passed through the Land of Cholchis, that now is called Mengrellis, Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontory, whereon Synop, a famous Haven Town of the Greeks, was afterwards built. Here it seems that they bestowed the weakest and most unserviceable of their train, together with the heaviest of their carriages, under some good guard; as drawing near to those Regions in conquest, whereof they were to try the utmost hazard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spake even now) dispose of their impediments, leaving them in a place of strength, where Antwerp now stands, which in place of strength, where Gaul, upon which they determined to adventure themselves in the purchase. From Synop, the way unto Phrygia, Lydia and Ionis, was fair and open to the Cimmerians, without any lag of Mountains, or any deep Rivers at all to flay their march: for Iris and Halys they had already passed.

What battles were fought with these Invaders and the Lydians, and with what variable success the one or other part wan and lost, I find not written, nor am able to conjecture. This I find that in the time of Arſes, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardis, the capital City of Lydia; only the Castle holding out against them. Further observe, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Cyges and Arſes Kings of Lydia, before this invasion, and by Halyattes and Cresus in the times following, all that Arſes did against the Cimmerians, and all, save burning the Mileſians Corn fields, that was done in his hands full of this business, that he could turn them to nothing else is quite omitted: whereby it may seem, that neither of the two did any thing worthy of remembrance in those Wars, but were glad enough that they did not lose all.

Certainly the miseries of War are never so bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or a great part of it, forsaking their own fairs, labour to root out the established Possessors of another Land; making room for themselves, their Wives and children. They that fight for the mastery, are pacified with judgments; which had they been yielded at the first, all had been quiet, and no sword brought. But in these migrations, the assailants bring to little with them, that they need all which their defendants have; their Lands and Cattel, their houses and their goods, even to the Cradles of the sucking Infants. The mercileſs terms of this controversy, arm both sides with desperate resolution: seeing one part must either win, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or lose their lives without redemption. Most of the Counties in Europe have felt examples thereof; as the mighty Empire of Rome was overthrown by such invasions. But our Isle of Britain can bear witness the diversity of Conquests; having by the happy Victory of Canutus, gotten the knowledge of all Civil Arts, in exchange of liberty, that was but slenderly instructed therein before; where as the issue of the Saxons and Danish Wars, was, as were the causes, quite contrary. For these did not seek after the Dominion only, but the entire possession of the Country, which the Saxons obtained, but Race, and defending all memorials of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Cimmerian blood) found such end of their enterprise, as it may seem that that the Cimmerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Asia, did arrive unto. So that by considering the process of the one, we shall the better conceive the fortune of the other. Many battles the Danes won, yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerors: Many the Saxons won upon the Danes, yet not so great, as could drive them quite away, and back from hence, after they had gotten firm footing. But in course of time, the long continuance even of utter enmity, had bred such acquaintance between them, as bowing the natures of both their people, made the one more pliant unto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced in one mild temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons in England, where great slaughter had made large room; others returning home, found their own Country wide enough to receive them, as having disburthened it of many thousands, that were lent to seek their graves abroad. And such (as I think) was the end of the Cimmerian War in Lydia; whereunto though some victory of Halyattes may have hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seems to have done most, in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should fear to add hereunto my further conjecture, which is, that the matter was so compounded between the Cimmerians and Halyattes, that the River of Halys should divide their Territories. For Halyattes was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Eastern side of the River was the Country of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians, and other Scythian people: whose wives and daughters these warlike women are supposed to have been.

And hereunto the quarrel ensuing between Halyattes and Cyaxares the Medes, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is said) fought in defence of certain Scythians, upon whom the Medians thought revenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutual slaughters, should have joined in a league of mutual defence for their common safety: though otherwise (it had been dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Medians to extend his Kingdom far Westward, whatsoever the pretences might be, of taking revenge upon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the War between these two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I find it of little weight, and less probability. He tells of Scythians, that being chafed out of their Country by faction, came unto Cyaxares, who committed unto them certain Boys, to be instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feat of Archery. Now it is felt out (saith he) that these Scythians using much to hunt, and commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did nevertheless other-whiles miss of their game, and came home as they went. Hereupon the King being forward and choleric, bitterly reviled them, and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boys that was under their charge, whom dressing like Venison, they presented unto him; which done, they fled unto Halyattes. This Herodotus delivers, as the ground of a War that lasted five years between the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding the fugitives to be delivered into his hand, the other refusing to betray such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians to betake themselves to either of these Kings unto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly, they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treachery that he shewed in his massacring of their Country-men that were in his Kingdom, of whom it is now meet that we should speak.

SECT. IV.

The War of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

As the Cimmerians held their course Westward, along the shores of the Euxine sea, to the Scythians and Sarmatians took the other way, and having the Caspian Sea on their left hand, passed between it and Caucasus, through Albania, Colchis, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Servan and Georgia, and so they entered into Media. The Medes encountered them in Arms, but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, which Plutarch saith Plutarch reigned in Egypt. If it were in the sixth year of Nabuchodonosor King over Babylon (supposing him to have reigned five and thirty otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then do the eight and twenty years of their Dominion end, one year before the great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giving him good leave to provide securely for the invasion of Syria, which expedition he began while his Father yet lived, as Josephus out of Berosus relates the History.

Now the Medes, desirous to save themselves as well as they might, from this terrible nation, which when they had no lull to a second trial of the sword, refused not to undergo the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serve to remove these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasant and better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to be persuaded that a little more travel would add a great deal more to their content. For they relied so much upon their own valour, that they feared no resistance, and being the bravest men, they thought it real that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes persuaded them into Egypt, I do not think, Babylon was near enough; whether if he could find these Locusts to graze, then should his unfriendly Neighbours have cause to laugh at his misfortune. What thick Nabuchodonosor made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I do not read. But it is well known that his Dominions lay in the middle between Media and Egypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributary; wherefore we may very well believe, that they watched their Horles in his Rivers, and that he also was content to give them provender. Yet Plutarch saith, that these Scythians (like the Jewish husband of a fair Wife) took care that they might not look upon Egypt, lest the sight thereof should more easily detain them there, than any force or persuasion that he could use would find them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow upon them, than on his Army that should keep them back: Egypt was rich and half the riches had not been ill spent in favouring all. Yet Plutarch took the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand in case they had been so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent compulsion. For he lay close upon the edge of the Wilderness in Gaza (as I take it) the Southernmost border of Palestina: whence he never advanced to meet with the Scythians, but gave them leave to feel as much of the scalding Sun-beams, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could bear upon them. When they were come as far as Aſcalon, the

the next City to Gaza, then did he assay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work so much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the heat of a Climate so far different from their own. Pannimeas had at his back a vast wilderness, over the forchings Lands whereof, the Syrians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary distempers, could ill have endured to pursue him through unknown ways, had they fought with him and prevailed, especially the Kingdom of Egypt being ready to entertain him with relief, and them with new trouble at the end of their weary journey. Wherefore they were content to be entreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visit their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Egyptian King (besides that he preferred his own Estate from a dangerous adventure, by hiring this great Army to depart from him) found all his Coast well ruyed in the proceeds of his War in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more than ever troubled themselves with their oppressors. For the Syrians, resolving now to seek no further, began to demand more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grievous exactions, they presumed to lay in dictation upon the Country, taking what they listed from the owners; and many times (as it were to save the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This tyrannous Dominion they long used over the higher Asia, that is over the Country lying between the Caspian and Red Seas: and between India and Asia the less. Happy it was for the poor people that in so large a space of ground, there was room enough for their covetousness, otherwise the calamity that fell, as it were by chance, upon those private men, to whose wealth any Syrian did bear a fancy, would have lighted in general upon all at one clap, leaving few alive, and none able to relieve their fellows. Yet it seems that the heaviest burthen lay upon Medias for it was a fruitful Country, not far from their own home, and lay under a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies, there also it was that they had the fatal blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Cyzaxer King of the Medes, who in this extremity was no better than a Rent-gatherer for the Syrians, perceiving that his Land lay unmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, resolved to prove what might be done by stratagem. The managing of the business in this delivered in brief: That he, and his Medes, feasted the better part of the Syrians, made them drunk, and slew them; recovering hereby the possession of all that they had lost.

Such another laughter was committed upon the Peasants in England; but it was revenged by the Country men, with greater cruelty than ever they had practised before. That the Syrians which escaped this bloody feast made any stir in Media, I do not find: neither do I read that either in revenge hereof, or upon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by invasion from Syria in time following.

This is the more strange, for that the Army returning home out of Media, was very strong, and encountered with opposition (as Herodotus reports) no less than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyzaxer to free his Country, took good effect, with less bloodshed than hath been supposed. For if he surprised all the chief of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Many of them doubtless in eight and twenty years had so well ferled themselves, that they were desirous of rest, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remain in the Country; many of whom I shall speak anon) having done what they could in the business, for which they came forth, were willing to return home with what they had gotten; such as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might go joyn with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or seek their fortunes in other Provinces among their own Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are said to have been with Nebuchadnezzar, it may be understood, that a great part of the Syrians, upon hope of gain, or desire to keep what they had already gained, were content to become subject unto Nabulassar's men: love of their wealth being most effectual, in turning the more unquiet love of inordinate liberty. It is certain, that Jer. 39. 38. Nebuchadnezzar, as ever after, so in his first beginning of war, did beat the Egyptians, who in ages going, had been accustomed to deal with the Babylonians after another fashion: and this new success of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane means, to such addition as this of new forces.

Of the Syrian Army returning out of Media, divers authors report a Story, which confirms me in the opinion, that this Company went forth to assist their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new feat, and civilising their plantation. For these had left their wives behind them; a good argument to prove that they meant to come again. The Syrian women, to comfort themselves in their husband's absence, became bed-fellows to their slaves. These got a lusty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers-in-law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their return. If they were only the children of slaves, which compounded an Army (as Herodotus would have it, who tells us, that the Syrians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it must needs be that they were very boys, or else that the Women did very little while he continue capt. Wherefore I rather beliee a tale as it is told by the Russians themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Historians, make that report of their Ancestors returning homewards, which I will set down as I find it in Mallet Rus. Com. mon-wealth. They understood by the way, that their Choro-lepsy, or Bond-slaves, whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their Towns, lands, houses, wives, and all. At which news being somewhat amazed, and yet disdainful the Villany of their servants, they made the more hast home, and so not far from Novograd met them in warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon advising what was best to be done, they agreed also to set upon them with no other flow of weapons but with their horse-whips (which as their manner is, every man ride with all) to put them in remembrance of their servile condition, thereby to terrify them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, and lashing altogether with their whips in their hands, they did the office, which seemed so terrible in the ears of their Villains, and strook such a sense into them of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled altogether like Sheep before the Driver. In memory of this victory, the Novogradians ever since have stamped their Coins (which they call Dingoes Novogradsky, curiously through all Russia) with the figure of a horse-man shaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may seem, that all the women of that Country have feared the word ever since, in regard of the universal fault: For such a Padkey or whip, as terrified those slaves, curiously wrought by her self, is the first present that the Muscovite wife, even in time of wooing, sends to him that shall be her husband, in token of submission, being well assured to feel it often on her own joints. But this was a Document unto the Syrians, or rather

Sarmatians (for Novograd stands in the Country that was called Sarmatia) to beware of abating themselves any more so long from their wives; which alter this, I find not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to set down of the Syrian expedition; not only because it is the most memorable, as performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, & terrible to many Countries; but for that it appears to have been a great cause of the Egyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, & about Judea, which continues yet a while the center of our discourse.

SECT. V.

Of Princes living in divers Countries, in those Ages.

Having thus far digressed from the matters of Judea, to avoid all further occasion of doing like the, I will here insert a note of such kings, & men of mark, as were between the death of Manasser, and the ruine of Jerusalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, & Lydians, I have spoken as much as I thought needful. In Rome, Tullius Hostilius held the Kingdom until the one & twentieth year of Judas; at which time Ancus Marcius succeeding, reigned four and twenty years. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new come stranger, but very rich, prevailed so far by his graciuness unto the people that he got the Kingdom to himself, disappointing the sons of Ancus, over whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth year of Zedekias, and reigned eight and thirty years. In this time it was, namely, in the second year of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedaemonians bethinking them how to be avenged of the Arcadians, who gave succour to the Messians against them in the former war, entered their Territory, took the City of Phigalia or Phidalia, from whence their Garrisons were soon after beaten off. Cyprius expelling the race of the Bacidae, made himself Lord of Corinth about these times, and governed it in peace thirty years; leaving for successor his son Feriarer, one of the seven Sages, but a cruel Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his own wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women stark naked, burnt their apparel, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceive, that the wisdom of the Greeks was not excellent in those days, when such a one as this could be admired as excelling all the Country.

In these times also were Zaleucus and Draco, famous law-givers, the one among the Locrians in Italy, the other in the City of Athens. The laws of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to have written them with blood: for he rewarded every final offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were soon abrogated, and power given to Solon by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the laws of Zaleucus were very mild. He forbade any Gentlewoman to walk abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unless it were when she was drunk, or to go forth of the Town by night, unless it were to recover sweet-hearts led a-courts her self up in immodest bravery, unless it were to inveigle a lover. By which pleasant Ordinances he effected his desire, for none would flume, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of justice, that when his own Son had committed Adultery, and was therefore to lose both his eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gave one eye of his own to save the young man (who also lost one) from utter blindness.

I shall not therefore need so far to wander, as hitherto I often have done, in pursuing of actions collateral to the History, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldeans will soon fall under the Persuas were long, encounter with the Greeks; the Greeks, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively practise themselves, in their flourishing Estate, it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minority. But in the long space of more than thirteen hundred years, which passed between the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Jerusalem, we find little matter, wherein the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very nearest borders. Yet read we of many Kingdoms, that in these many ages were erected and thrown down; as likewise many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any near distance; all which must have been quite omitted, or else reserved unto a very unseasonable rehearsal, had they not been dispensed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the convenience, may pardon the necessity.

SECT VI.

The oppression of Judea, and destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans.

Now to return to the Jewish Story, from whence we have so far digressed. In the third year of Jehojakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet living, entered Judea with a great Army, who besieging and forcing Jerusalem, made Jehojakim his vassal in despite of Nebos, that had established him King, and took with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a child, with Azarias, Misach, and Aznarus. Also he took a part of the Temple's treasures; but stayed not to search them thoroughly; for Nebos hastened to the succour of Jehojakim, hoping to find Nabuchodonosor in Judea; wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himself and his Army, it being a Country of an evil affliction towards him, as also far off from any succour or sure place of retreat. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Sethian horse-men in his Army, it was the more wisely done of him, to fall back, out of the rough, mountainous, and over-hot Country into places that were more even and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father happening at the same time, gave him a just occasion to return home, and take possession of his own Kingdom, before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more unto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him so far, and to bid him battle, until the new year came in; which was the fourth of Jehojakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Nebos. In this year the Babylonian lying upon the Bank Euphrates (his own territory bounding it on the North-side) attending the arrival of Nebos. There, after a resolved contention for victory, Nebos was slain, and his Army remaining forced to save its self, which full it did, by a violent retreat. This victory Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatsoever the Egyptian held out of their proper Territory towards the North. The Egyptian being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Jehojakim held himself quiet, as being friend in heart unto the Egyptians, yet having made his peace with the Chaldeans the year before; who contented with such profit as he could then readily make, had forborn to lay any Tribute upon Juda. But this cool reverendness of Jehojakim, was on both sides taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Pannimek, who succeeded unto Nebos, began to think upon restoring Jehozabab, taken prisoner by his Father, and setting him up as a Domestical Enemy against his ungrateful brother. Against all such accidents, the

9. Jehoiakim had prepared the usual remedy practised by his forerunners; for he made his son Jehonias King with him long before, in the second year of his own Reign, when the Boy was but eight years old. As for this rumour of Jehoiakim's return, the Prophet Jeremy foretold, that it should prove idle, saying: He shall not return thither, but shall die in the place whither they had led him captive, and shall see this Land no more. The Egyptians indeed, having left all their Mercenary forces, and received that heavy blow at Carchemish had not remaining such proportion of sharp steel, as of fair gold, which without other help, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Pamissus Aperis, who reigning after Pamissus, did once adventure to show his face in Syria; but after a big look, he was glad to retire, without adventuring the hazard of a battle. Wherefore this deceiving Nation ought only with brave words, telling such frivolous tales, as men that mean to do nothing, use, of their glorious adventures, passed, against Jehoiakim and Jehoshaphat. In this case it was easy for Jehoiakim to give them satisfaction, by letting them understand the sincerity of his affection towards them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to work more roundly. He sent a peremptory message to Jehoiakim, willing him not to stand upon any nice points, but acknowledge himself a Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hereto such fearful threats, as made the poor Judeans afraid all thoughts of Pharaoh, and yield to do, as the more mighty would have him. So he continued in the obedience of Nabuchodonosor three years. At this time the Prophet cried out against the Jews, putting them in mind that he had now three and twenty years exhorted them to repentance, but because they had flouted their ears against him, and the rest of the Prophets, he now pronounced their captivity at hand, and that he should endure the yoke of bondage full seventy years. The same calamity he threatened to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the rest, foretelling that they should all drink out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his fury which they had forsaken; and after the twenty years expired, that the Babylonians themselves would taste of the same Cup, and be utterly subverted by the Medes, and the Judeans permitted to return again into their own Fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Jeremy seems to have been in the fourth year of this Jehoiakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he sent to read them unto the peoples and afterwards unto the Princes, who offered them to the King; but hearing the Kings fury, they had first let Jeremy at liberty, and advised him and Baruch to hide themselves.

Jehoiakim, when he heard a part of it, and perceived the ill news therein delivered, made no more ado, but did cut the Book in pieces and cast it into the fire. All which Jeremy could be new written with this addition; that the dead body of Jehoiakim should be cast out, exposed in the day to the heat, and his feet to sit on the Throne of David.

Time thus running on, while Jehoiakim rested secure of all dangers, Tributary to the Babylonians, yet well thought of by the Egyptians, the mighty City of Tyre opposed it self against the Chaldean forces, and upon just confidence of her own strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now forasmuch as the term of seventy years was prescribed unto the defolation, as well of Tyre, as of Jerusalem, and other Towns and Countries it is apparent, that they which referre the expugnation of this City unto the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, have sure authority for their warrant. Whereupon likewise it follows of necessity, that the siege thereof began in the seventh of his Reign, as having lasted thirteen years.

Here I will take leave to intrude a brief notice, concerning the several beginnings of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath risen much defolation. The third year of Jehoiakim was the last of Nabulphar, who being delivered from other cares, took notice of such as had revolted from him unto Pharaoh Necho, and sent this Noble Prince, his Son, with an Army into Syria, to reclaim them. In this expedition was Danile carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same Year. The year next following, being the fourth of Jehoiakim, was the first of Nabuchodonosor, which Jeremy affirmeth in expresse words, and from Jer. 1. 11. which we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth year he conquered Egypt, and then began to reign as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offend him. The second from this year it was, wherein he saw that vision, of the Image consisting of sundry Metals; which did prefigure the succession of great Kingdoms, that should rule the Earth before the coming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I find, of long disputations; but return unto the siege of Tyre, which began in the seventh of his Reign.

The City of Tyre covered all the ground of an Island, that was divided from the main, by a deep and broad channel of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men: the Tyrans, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to use them, excelled all other Nations; and every wind, from one part or other, brought needfull provisions into the City. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof nevertheless the judgments of God denounced against it by Ezra, Jeremy, and Ezekiel had threatened the destruction, and the oblation of Nabuchodonosor had fully determined to perform it. This high minded King, impatient of excellence, undertook a vast piece of work, even to fill up the Sea that parted the Island from the Continent. The City of old Tyre that stood opposite to the new, upon the firm Land, and the Mountain of Libanus neerer adjoining, that laden with Cedars, and abundance of other trees, might furnish him with Materials. Thirteen years were spent in this laborious, and almost hopeless business. Which need not seem strange for Alexander working upon that foundation which was remaining of Nabuchodonosor's Fleet, and being withal assisted with a strong Fleet, was yet seven months ere he could make way into the City. Wherefore if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that wherewith Alexander laboured to cover a shell, with much more violence could it overturn, and as it were consume, the work of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottom of the deep; striving as it were to fill the empty belly of this Cormorant, whereas the Macedonian did only flop the throat of it. Every man knows, God could have furthered this accomplishment of his own threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to use either Miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earthquakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calm, and adding the favourable concurrence of all second helps. But so it pleases him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to use the hand of man striving, as may seem, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldeans. Every hand was made bold, and every shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not give over till he was master of the Town.

When he was entered upon this desperate service, whether whether it were so, that some loss received some mutiny in his Army, or (which is most likely, and so Josephus reports it) some glorious rumour of the Egyptians, gave courage to his evil willers; Jehoiakim renounced his subjection, and began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonosor gave him no leisure to do much hurt: but with part of his Army marched directly into Judea, where the amazed King made so little resistance (the Egyptians having let him as it were, in a dream) that he entered Jerusalem, and laid hands on Jehoiakim, whom he first bound and determined to send to Babylon, but changing counsel, he caused him to be slain in the place, and gave him the sepulchre of an Affliction, to be devoured by beasts and ravenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leaving in his Place Jehoiakim's son Jehonias his son; whom after three months and ten days Nabuchodonosor removed, and sent prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardocheus, and Zedechias, the high Priest. The mother of Jehonias, together with his servants Eunuchs, and all the able men, and best Artificers of the land, were also carried away Captives. This Jehonias, following the counsel of Jeremy the Prophet, made no resistance; but he submitted himself to the Kings will; wherein he both pleased God, and did that which was best for himself; though at the present it might seem otherwise, to such as considered the evil that befall him, rather than the greater evil that he thereby avoided. This only particular act of his is recorded, which was good. But it seems that he was partaker, at least of his Father's faults, if not an Instigator, to be the cause, that his submitting himself to Gods pleasure did not preserve his Estate: for so we read in general word, that he did evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his third Nabuchodonosor established Mabuthas his Uncle in the Kingdom of Judea, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the justice of God. For like as Necho King of Egypt had formerly displaced Jehoiakim, after his Father Jehoiakim was slain, and set up Jehoiakim, the son of another mother, so Nabuchodonosor slew Jehoiakim, who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his son Jehonias Prisoner to Babel, gave the Kingdom to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Jehoiakim, whom Necho took with him into Egypt. From Zedechias he required an oath for his faithful obedience, which Zedechias gave him, and called the living God to witnesses in the same, that he would remain assured to the Kings of Chaldea.

In the fifth year of Zedechias, Jeremy saw and expounded the vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one signifying those Judeans that were carried away captive, the other those that stayed and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Jeremy wrote in a book all the evil that should fall upon Babylon, which book or scroll he gave to Sheraiah, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonosor's killing him first to read it to the Captive Jews, and then to bind it to a flag, and call it into remembrance, pronouncing these words: Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her. This journey of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to have been in a way of visitation, carrying some presents. But I further think, that he had some fate there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his return all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seems) to those unquiet courses, from which Jeremy detested both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes, one of which he wore about his own neck, others he sent to the five Kings, of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visit Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Judea abode in the obedience of Babylon they should then possess and enjoy their own Countries; if not, they should assuredly perish by the sword, by fire and pestilence.

He also for told them, that those Vessels which as yet remained in Jerusalem, should also travel after the rest, and at length they should be restored again.

The same year Amnias, the false Prophet, took off the wooden Chain, which Jeremy wore in sign of the captivity of the Jews, and brake it, vaunting, that in like manner, after two years God would break the strength of Babel, and the yoke that he laid on all Nations; restore Jehonias and all the Jews, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and give an end to all these troubles. But Jeremy, instead of his wooden yoke, wore a Collar of iron; and in sign that Amnias had given a deceitful and false hope to the people, he foretold the death of this old Prophet, which fell upon him in the second Month. After this, when Zedechias had wavered long enough between Faith and Falshood, in the eighth year of his reign, he perished more ferociously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Syrizans, and others that were promised great aydes of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose assistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge, he marched with his Army in the dead of the winter, toward Jerusalem, and besieged it. Jeremy perswaded Zedechias to render the City and himself: but being confident of the help from Egypt, and being perswaded by his Counsellors and false Prophets, that it was impossible that the Kingdom of Judea should be extirpate, until the coming of Silo (according to the Prophecy of Isaiah: he despised the words of Jeremy, and imprisoned him. For Jeremy had told the King, that the City should be taken and burnt: that the King should not escape, but be taken prisoner, and be brought to the presence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perish by the sword, but being carried to Babel, die his natural death.

Jerusalem being the following year surrounded by Nabuchodonosor's Army; the King of Egypt, Phraos Hophra, according to Jeremy, (Hirodus calleth him Aphris) entered the border of Judea with his Army to succour Zedechias, of whose revolt he had been the principal Author. But Jeremy gave the Jews faithful counsel, willing them not to have trust in the succour of Egypt: for he assured them that they should return again, and in no sort relieve them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans removed from Jerusalem to encounter the Egyptians, the false vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough, leaving the poor people of Jerusalem to their destined miseries.

In the mean while the Jews, who in their first extremity had manumitted their Hebrew Bond-men (as God law required at the year of Jubilee) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now upon the breaking up of the Chaldean Army, repent them of their Charity; and thinking all had been at an end, held them perforce to their former slavery. But the Chaldees being returned to the siege, the Prophet Jeremy, when the state of Jerusalem began now to grow to extremity, counselled Zedechias to render himself unto them, assuring him of his own will, and the safety of the City, if he would do so. But his obdurate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his inidelity and perjury, had provided for.

or, according to Iosaphus eighteen, the Babylonian Army laid before Jerusalem and held it exceeding straitly besieged. For they built Forts against it round about, or (as Martyr hath it extraneum contra eam turrim lignum per circuitum) They surrounded the city with wooden Towers. So as the besieged could neither fall out, nor receive into the City any supply of men or victuals. Iosaphus reports, that they overtopped the walls with high Towers raised upon Mounts; from which they did beat upon the wall with their Engines, 'till at the Chaldeans were compelled to forsake their Stations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counter-buildings, like unto these, yet the great King, of Babel, who commanded all the Regions thereabouts, and had the Woods and Rivers to obey him, found means to overthrow all the Citizens castigons, and to beat down as fast from without, as they raised from within; the body and foundation of his own works being guarded by the walls of Jerusalem interposed, and theirs within, laid open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both Famine and Pestilence (which commonly accompany men straitly besieged) grew on fast upon them, whereby, when the number, strength and courage of the Jews failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their Princes did treat themselves, as Lords of the Town, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this uncomfortable sight, and finding no remedy of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hopes at once, and shifted himself together with his Wives, Children, Princes, and principal servants, out of the City, by a way under ground, leaving his amazed and giddy people to the merciless swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremy the Prophet persuaded him to render himself, despised both the counsel of God, and the force of Nabuchodonosor, used now that remedy, which Volupius truly termeth, Triste, turpe, & infelix: Wofull, shameful, and unfortunate.

By this secret subterranean vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recovered (by the help of the dark night) the Plains or Desarts of Jericho; but by reason of the train that followed him and his, (every one leading with him those whom they held most dear unto them) he was easily traced and pursued. How great forever the company was that attended on him, yet as Iosaphus reports it, they, on whose fidelity he most reposed himself, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shewed themselves into the Desarts, as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias was made Prisoner, with his Children and Princes: he was conveyed to Babel or Rebels a City (as some think) of Nephtulim where Nabuchodonosor then lay, as a place indifferent between Jerusalem & Tyre, with both which at once he had to do.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had laid before Zedechias the many graces and benefits conferred upon him, together with the notable falsehood and perjury, wherewith he had requited them he commanded his Children, Princes and Friends to be slain before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last that ever he should behold in the world, he caused his eyes to be torn out of his head and to carry him in a slow manner to Babel, where he consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetual imprisonment. Herein this most marvellous Prophecy of Ezekiel was performed. Adducam eum in Babiloniam & ipsam uis uidebis: I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not see it.

Thus in the eleventh and last year of Zedechias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor the Chaldean entered the City by force, where sparing no sex nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

In the next year following, Nabuzaradan General of the Army burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Jerusalem; and after this fire had lasted from the seventh to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the Ground, when it had stood four hundred thirty and one years.

After this upon a second search, Nabuzaradan (not yet fatigued with blood) commanded seventy and two others to be slaughtered, which had hidden themselves from the first fury, to wit, the chief, and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of war, five of his household servants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Judea; and leaving the poor labouring souls, with some that followed the party of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground over whom he left Governour, Godoliah the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Isaiah had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his justice and equity, by Iosaphus highly commended. This man a Jew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it seemeth in the beginning of the war: and by Jeremias desire to live with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same advice which the Prophet gave unto Zedechias, which was to submit himself altogether to the Babylonians; who being ordained by God to execute his justice, was therefore relentless. The Prophet Jeremy being left to his own choice, either to live in Chaldea, or elsewhere, he made election of Godoliah, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Jeremy, but gave comfort to all the other Jews that were left under his charge, promising them favour and liberty, so long as they remained obedient subjects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom he was established Provincial Governour of his own Nation.

But ere that year was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of Jerusalem had kept himself out of the storm, with Basai King of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other chosen men, while Godoliah treated them in Mispha or Mispha, the City of his residence, traiterously slew him, together with divers Chaldeans and Jews that accompanied him. This done, he made an escape, and in his way encountering with eighty persons, repairing towards Godoliah with presents he slew the most part of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discover unto him some Treasures hidden in the fields during the war. He also took with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonosor. This practice and intent of Ismael had been formerly discovered to Godoliah by Johanan, one of the leaders of the few remaining Jews; but Godoliah was incredulous.

Judea being now left without a Governour (for Ismael durst not take it upon him, but retired himself, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Jews, fearing the revenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to fly away into Egypt, and besought Jeremy to ask counsel of God for them: who readily made them answer, that if they remained in Judea, God would provide for them, and shew them mercy; but if they sought to save themselves in Egypt, that they should then undoubtedly perish. Notwithstanding this advice, the Jews held their determinations, and despising the Oracle of God, and contraining Jeremy and Baruch to accompany them, they travelled into Egypt, and inhabited by the permission of Pharo, near unto Taphne, where when Jeremy often reprehended them for their Idolatry, foretelling both the destruction of themselves, and the Egyptians also, he was by these his own hardhearted and ungoverned Countrymen stoned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly revered him, buried near the Sepulchre of their own Kings.

Of the Time passing between the Destruction of Jerusalem, and the fall of the Assyrian Empire.

SECT. I.

Of the Connexion of Sacred and Profane History.

THE course of time, which in profane Histories might rather be discerned through the greatest part of its way hitherto passed, in some outworn foot-steps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Eastern Countries by the account from Nabonassar, left fair marks, and more applicable to actions concurrent, than were the War of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruin of Jerusalem, to discover the connexion of antiquity foretold, with the story of succeeding Ages. Manifest it is, that the original and progress of things could ill be sought in those that were ignorant of the first Creation: as likewise that the affairs of Kingdoms and Empires afterwards grown up, are not to be found among those that have now no state nor policy remaining of their own. Having therefore pursued the History of the World unto that age, from whence the memory of succeeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse derived unto us: I hold it now convenient, briefly to shew, by what means and circumstances the History of the Hebrews, which of all other is the most ancient, may be conjoined with the following times, wherein that Image of sundry metals discovered by God unto Nabuchadnezzar, did reign over the earth, when Israel was either none, or an ungoverned Nation.

Herein I do not hold it needful to insist upon those authorities which give, as it were by hear-say, a certain year of some old Assyrian King unto some action or event, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Nova his his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his Issue that occupied the Kingdom afterwards, depending upon the uncertain relations of such as were neither constant in affixing the years of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to rely upon. Let it therefore suffice, that the content and harmony which some have found in the years of those over-worn Monarchs, doth preserve their names, which otherwise might have been forgotten. Now concerning the latter Kings of that Nation, howsoever it be true, that we find the names of all, or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by Prophane Historians; yet hereby could we only learn in what Age each of them lived, but not in what year his reign began or ended, were it not that the reign of Nebuchadnezzar is more precisely applied to the times of Jehoiachin and Zedekias. Hence have we the first light whereby to discover the means of connecting the Sacred and Prophane Histories. For under Nebuchadnezzar was the beginning of the Captivity of Judah, which ended when seventy years were expired; and these seventy years took end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well known, affords us means of looking back into the Ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first year of Cyrus his reign in Persia, by general consent, is joined with the first year of the 55 Olympiads, where that he reigned three and twenty years before his Monarchy, and seven years afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controversy. Giving therefore four hundred and eight years unto the distance between the fall of Troy, and the insurrection of the Olympiad by Iphitus; we may easily arrive unto those antiquities of Greece, which were not merely fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilst in sundry parts of the World, St. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting down their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approved faith and industry.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned unto Alexander, and from him to the battle of Issum, it were (peradventure) in this place impertinent to set down. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian Captivity, are marks whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first unto the last years of the World through any story, with least interruption; it is very expedient that we take some pains to inform our selves truly of the Seventy years during which it continued, even from Nebuchadnezzar unto Cyrus.

SECT. II.

A brief rehearsal of two Opinions touching the beginning of the Captivity: with an answer to the cavils of Porphyrus, inveighing against St. Matthew and Daniel, upon whom the latter of these Opinions is founded.

Many Commentators, and other Historians and Chronologers find, that the Captivity then began, when Jechonia was carried prisoner into Babylon, eleven years before the final destruction of Jerusalem under Zedekias. This they prove out of divers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth Chapter, where he makes a plain distinction between the beginning of the Captivity, and utter destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, in these words; In the five and twentieth year of our Exile, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year, after that the City was smitten. In which words he beginneth the Captivity in plain terms, eleven years before the City was destroyed. Berodad is of opinion, that it began in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Josiah; which he endeavours to prove out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of St. Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of disputation, but serve not to make good so much as Berodad would enforce. That place of St. Matthew, and the whole Book of Daniel, have ministered occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christian Religion to that wretched man Porphyrius, who not understanding how the Sons of King Josiah were called by divers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what, in reckoning the Sons, or according to some Translations, the Sons, and Nephews of that good King, begotten about the time of the Captivity. Upon Daniel also, the same Porphyrius doth spend the twelfth of his malicious Books written against the Christians affirming, that these Prophecies and Visions, remembered by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or near the time of Antiochus Epiphanius. This fond supposition of his, Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, have sufficiently answered. For the Seventy Interpreters, who converted the Old Testament about an hundred years before Epiphanius, did all turn this Book out of Hebrew into Greek, as a part of Scripture received. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrius, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who lived divers years before Antiochus Epiphanius. For Jaddus the High Priest shewed that great Conqueror, when he first came towards Jerusalem to have destroyed it, this Book of Daniel, wherein he beheld his own glory foretold, as the same was plainly expounded unto him; which not only layed his hand from the harm of that City and people; but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future peril and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Eastern Empire, in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one City, to wit, Tyre in Phoenicia.

It is true indeed, that the Jews themselves give less authority to Daniel, than to Moses and the Prophets; accomplishing his Book among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they lay Esdra, and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their return from Babylon. But first, that the Book of Daniel (I mean so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonical; secondly, that it was written by Daniel himself, and not by Esdra and the Seniors; we may assure our selves by testimony of Councils and Fathers. For in the Council of Laodicea, held about the year of our Lord 368, after the death of Jovianus the Emperour; and after the Niceus Council three and forty years, this Book of Daniel was received, verified and confirmed among the other Canonical Scriptures, as in the Epitomy of the same Council it may be seen; and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witness Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History, the fourth Book, fifth and twentieth Chapter: so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonical Books upon Origen: so doth Hilarius in his Preface upon the Psalms, and Epiphanius in his Book of Weights and Measures, &c. To these I may add St. Hierom, Gregory Gregory Nazianzen, and others. For, the Hagiographa-Books, or holy Writings, the Jews and Rabbin reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Hester, Esdra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Esdra, that wrote this Book, Gods commandment unto him by his Angel, to seal up the same to the time appointed, is an unanswerable testimony. Yea, that which exceedeth all strength of other proof, our Saviour Christ, who citeth no Apocryphal Scripture, in Matthew and Mark alledgeth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his ninth Chapter. Further, in the fifth of John, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Dan 12. 2. St. Paul describeth Antichrist, out of Daniel; and the Revelation is wholly an interpretation of Daniel's Visions.

SECT. III.

That the seventy years of Captivity are to be numbred from the destruction of Jerusalem; not from the migration of Jechonia.

HAVING thus far digressed in maintaining that authority which must often be cited in the present argument: it is now convenient that we return unto the differences of opinion concerning the beginning of these seventy years. Neither will I stand to trouble my self and others with laying open the grounds or weakness of that which Eusebius, and some few nameless Authors, have founded; times held in this point, which is lately revived by Berodad; but will forthwith enter into consideration of that opinion, which many, both ancient and late Writers, have so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Four Kings of Juda were carried away Captives to Babylon: First, Manasse; then Jehoiachin; and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: Thirdly, Jechonias, and with him Ezekiel: Lastly, Zedekias, at which time the City and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these Captivities, the beginning of the seventy years is referred by none that I have read; to the second, by few, and with weak proof; to the third, by very many, and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered out of Jeremy, which may seem to make the matter plain. For the Prophet, in comforting the people that were carried away with Jechonias, useth these words: Thus saith the Lord, After seventy years be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and perform my good promise towards you, and cause you to return to this place.

But it stands indeed with little reason, that we should take the interpretation of a Prophecy out of circumstances, when the Prophecy is such as doth sufficiently expound it self. Jeremy hath already, in the fourth year of Jehoiachin, denounced the judgment of God against the Land, for the sins and impenitency of that obdurate people, in these words: Behold, I will send, and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar the King of Babel, my servant: and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all the Nations round about; and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continual desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness; the voice of the Bridegroom, and the voice of the Bride; the noise of the mill-stones, and the light of the candle; and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serve the King of Babel seventy years. And when seventy years are expired, I will visit you, saith the Lord, the voice prescribed unto the Captivity the term of seventy years: which were to commence, neither when the Prophecy was uttered; nor when Jehoiachin, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar; nor yet in the time of Jechonia: but with the utter desolation of the City, whereof Jeremy did again give notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliverance before rehearsed. And so did the people understand this Prophecy, in those times when they saw it accomplished; beginning the seventy years at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the History of Judah, where it is said thus: *They burnt the House of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: and they that were left by the sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were servants to him, and to his sons, until the Kingdom of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the Word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the days that the Lay desolate, he kept Sabbath, to fulfill seventy years. But in the first year of Cyrus King of Persia (when the Word of the Lord spoken by the mouth of Jeremiah, was fulfilled) the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. We seldom find one piece of Scripture, so precisely and plainly expounded by another as in this Prophecy, to have afterwards been the subject of altercation. For one can hardly devise how either the Desolation could have been expiected more sensibly, than it was by the Prophet; or the event of the Prophecy have been more exactly set down, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more proof in to evidence a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yields testimony sufficient unto this exposition of Jeremiah's Prophecy, that Jerusalem was to lye waste seventy years. For in the first year of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the seventy, Daniel obtained of God the deliverance that had been promised, by prayer, which he made upon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth in these words: *In the first year of his reign, I Daniel understood by Books the number of the years whereof the Lord had spoken unto Jeremiah the Prophet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolation of Jerusalem. So that howsoever the time of Daniel's own Captivity be reckoned from the taking of Jehoiachin, and that the people carried away with Jechonia, did accomplish, as well they might, the years of their own Captivity; yet with the general desolation of the Country, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabit, began in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor the great Captivity, which by Gods appointment continued unto the end of seventy years.

This I will not further seek to prove, by the authority of Tosephus and others affirming the same; forasmuch as that which already hath been produced, is enough to satisfy any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrary.

SECT. IV.

Sundry opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the seventy years.

What Kings reigned in Babylon, during these seventy years of the Captivity, and how long each of them did wear the Diadem, it is a matter of no great importance to know; forasmuch as neither their names were notable in the age wherein they lived; nor the length of their reigns any way helpful to the concordance of times, foregoing or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon, of Syria, Arabia (or rather some part of it) Hircania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seem fruits of the Victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betook himself to eat, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdom, and for the honour of his Majesty; where it may seem that he and his Heirs kept a great feast, and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Assyrian Soldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, did argue no less. For whereas under Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and indolent, that (to omit other proofs) they attempted, and finished that hardy piece of work, of winning the strong City of Tyre, by joining into it the Continent, filling up the deep and broad channel of the Sea, dividing it from the Main with a mole or piece of Earth, and other matter; the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexander works: in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach nearer to the Enemy than their Bows would carry; but were ready to turn their backs as soon as any, though inferior in numbers, adventuring within the distance, offered to charge them.

Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnezzar Wars, till the ruin of their Empire, were not worthy to be recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and reign of their several Kings, unworthy of the great labour that hath in vain been taken in that business. For when it is granted, that the Captivity of Judah, ending with that Empire, lasted seventy years, we may as reasonably forbear to search into the particular continuance of two or three stoulish Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children living in the Egyptian servitude; resting satisfied in both, with the general affixed sum.

Yet forasmuch as many have travelled in this business, upon desire (as I take it) to approve the beginning and end of the seventy years, not only by the reigns of other Princes, ruling elsewhere, but by the times of the Assyrians themselves; I will not refuse to take a little pains in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I think may best be held for likely, if the certain truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting down the years of their several reigns. The first (and as I take it) the surest is theirs, who merely follow the authority of the Scriptures, without borrowing any help from others. There name only three Kings, Nebuchadnezzar, Evlmerodach, and Balthasar; Neither have they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other, to be their warrant; but the Prophecy of Jeremy precisely, and in a manner purposely touching the very same. For God by the mouth of the Prophet; shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all according to his own will, and making it known that he had put some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, faith thus: And all Nations shall serve him, and his son, and his sons son, until the very time of his Land come also; then many Nations and great Kings shall serve themselves of him. These words expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. It indeed I find no other necessity of qualification to use herein, than such as may grow out of mens desire, to reconcile the Scriptures unto Prophane Authors. And this desire were not unjust, if the content of all Histories were on the one side, and the letter of the Holy Text were single on the other side.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofs of their different reports, are so slender and insufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not been thus delivered in Scriptures, but only left down by some Author of equal credit with the rest, might very well have found and deserved as good belief, as any of those things which they have delivered in this point. For some there are, who following Josephus, derive that Empire, as by descent, from Father to Son, through five Jds. I. Great, and giving to him 43 years; to Evlmerodach 18; to Nightfar the Son of Evlmerodach 40; to Labofardach the Son of Nightfar 9 months; and lastly, to Balthasar (whom Josephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his Father) 17 years. And this opinion (save that he forbears to reckon the years, and plainly calls Balthasar the Son of Labofardach) St. Hieron doth follow, alleging Berosus, and Josephus as a Scriptor of Berosus, for his Authors; though Berosus, as he is cited by Josephus, report the matter far otherwise. For he tells us, that Evlmerodach the Son of Nabuchodonosor did reign but six years, for his wickedness and lust slain by his Sisters Husband Nizzigilissor, who occupied the Kingdom after him four years, and left it to his own Son Labofardach; who being an ill-conditioned Boy, was at the end of nine months slain by such as were about him, and the Kingdom given to one Nabonidas, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it unto Cyrus after 17 years. The relation ill agrees with that of Josephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of years, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, have procured unto them some authority; so that the names which they have inked, are taken as it were upon trust. There is a third opinion which makes the three last Kings Brethren, and Sons of Evlmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather believe Xenophon, who faith that the last King of Babylon was immediate Successor to his Father. But whereas the Author of the Schoolical History, who is founder of this opinion, placeth between him that took Jerusalem, and Evlmerodach, another Nabuchodonosor: plain enough it is that he hath, out of any Hittory Sacred or Prophane, as little warrant to guide him, as we have reason to follow him. Eusebius, Sulpicius Severus, and Theodoret, upon better ground have supposed, that Evlmerodach and Balthasar were were brethren and sons of the great Nabuchodonosor. This is built on the fifth Chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthasar (or of Evlmerodach) is not none that ever doubted) is often called Nabuchodonosor his Son. And so common grew this explication, that St. Hieron called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Jeremy before cited, proves that Balthasar was not the Son indeed, but the Grand-child of that great Conquerour, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Eastern Languages, he was called the Son.

Amnius his Metaphyses his very rightly the seventy years of Captivity, giving to Nabuchodonosor forty years, to Evlmerodach 30 years, and to the three Sons of Evlmerodach, Nephews of Nabuchodonosor, fourteen years; that is, to Reg-Assar the eldest son, three years; to Lab-Assar-Dach the second son, six years; and to Balthasar the third Son, five.

To this account agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole sum of years, and in the number of generations, I have sometime subscribed; and not daring to reject an appearance of truth, upon no greater reason, than because the Author was of Amnius his edition. Yet could I not fash me well herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few of the Modern Writers as deserve to be regarded, have contented with this Metaphyses; and for that in making Balthasar succeed unto his Brother in the Kingdom, and not unto his Father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose History of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian War, I cannot slightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the King was at his drunken feast.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might give any light in this obscurity, I have found manifest proof, that the time allotted unto Balthasar by Amnius his Metaphyses, was far short of the truth; which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the seventy years he pleased among the rest. For in the third year of Balthasar, Daniel saw a Vision, after which he was sick certain days; but when he rose up, he did the Kings business; from which business, that he did afterwards withdraw himself, and live retired, so long, that he was forgotten in the Court; it appears plainly, both by the many words which the old Queen used to set out his sufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he were Daniel? Now to think that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two years have been worn out of remembrance, were in my judgment a very strange conceit; which rather than I would entertain, I can well be contented to think the whole Story (thus related) a part of Amnius his Impostures.

Out of these reports of Josephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are raised, by conjectures of late Writers. For, the endurance of the Captivity being 70 years, and these years extending unto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his Son and Grand-child, must have reigned; it hath seemed needful to supply the years of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reigns might fill up the whole continuance of the Captivity; with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Evlmerodach and Balthasar, joined unto the years following the nineteen of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Jerusalem was laid desolate) are nothing even.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the years of Evlmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18 years given to him by Josephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbered 28 years; and the two years that Berosus hath allowed to Evlmerodach, should be written 23. In the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2) and in the latter there should have been added the figure of (3) to that of (2); this granted (to wit) that Evlmerodach reigned 28 years, whereof five together with his Father, and 23 after his death, and the same number of 23 added to the 23 which Nabuchodonosor lived after the destruction of Jerusalem, make 48, than 4 years of Nightfar, according to Berosus, seven months of Labofardach his son, and 17 years of Nabonidas or Balthasar, make up the number of seventy years to the first of Cyrus. But whether by error in figures, or in words, the numbers be utterly mistaken in all Copies extant; upon how weak a foundation do they build, who having nothing to help them, save only the bare names of two unknown Kings, found in Authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had been entirely extant, were not worthy to have the place of Jeremy called into dispute, in regard of their authority?

SECT. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reigns of the Babylonian Kings.

Other suppositions, little different in substance from this of Athenius, I purposely forebear to rehearse, as falling under the same answer. That of Joseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deserving to be considered apart from the rest. He gives to Nebuchadnezzar 44 years, to Evlmerodach two, to Bethazer 5, and to Nabonidas 17. So that from the 19 of Nebuchadnezzar, in which Jerusalem was destroyed, unto the time of Cyrus, he accounted only 50 years; beginning (as many do) the Captivity 11 years sooner, from the transportation of Jeconiah. But hereof enough hath been said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running between the 19 of Nebuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Chaldean Empire: wherein if he have erred, then is all further inquiry frivolous.

Concerning the length of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, I shall hereafter upon better occasion deliver my opinion. The time which he gives to Evlmerodach is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For we find in Jeremy, that this Evlmerodach in the first of his reigns, shewing all favour to Jeconiah, did among other things, take order for him at his Table; and that he did continually eat bread before him all the days of his life. His portion was a continual portion given him of the King of Babel, Jer. 52: 33. every day certain, all the days of his life until he died. The very found of these words (which is more to be esteemed than the authority of Berosus, were he perfectly extant) imports a far longer time than two years, wherein Jeconiah under this gentle Prince, enjoyed the comfort sent by God, whose commandment he had obeyed in yielding himself to Nebuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Jeconiah did live, it cannot be proved; but plain it is hereby, that all his remaining days he did eat bread before this King. Now that he lived not so short a while after this as two years, it is more than likely; for he was but 55 years when he was set at liberty, having been 17 years in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the rate of 18 years; after which time it seems plain that he begat Sala thiel, as well by the age of Zerobabel, who is said to have been but a young man, and one of Darius his Pages, threecore years after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it self.

Of Belsazar, to whom Scaliger gives the next five years, naming him also Laborusardach, I should wonder why he calls him Nebuchadnezzar's daughter's son, were it not that herein I find him very careful to help out Berosus, by shifiting in his Niriglossor, as husband to Nebuchadnezzar's daughter, and Protector of his son four of these years; by which means there remains about one year to Belsazar alone, agreeing nearly with nine months assigned by Berosus to the son of Niriglossor. But Jeremy hath told us, that it was to Nebuchadnezzar, and to his son, and to his sons son (not to his daughters son) that the Empire was promised: which difficulty, if Scaliger could not help, it was well done of him to pass it over with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these, whom others (desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) have judged to be all one with Balthazar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firm Berosus: for Berosus makes him of the same stock and race, a Babylonian. I speak not this to disgrace the truth, but to shew a learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and judgment, that he was not so wedded to any Author, as affected with the love of truth) but to shew that he himself, having in some points disliked those Writers, whom in general he approveth, might with greater reason have wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirm this opinion in Scaliger, that he whom Berosus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies unto us, that Darius took the Kingdom, not saying that he won it by force of arms: Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Original, or of the Greek translation, which expressing no force of arms, doth only signify that Darius too: or received the Kingdom; I see no reason why we should thereupon infer, that the next King entered by Election: seeing Daniel relateth not the means and circumstances of Balthazar's death, but only the swift accomplishment of his own Prophecy. Neither could it indeed have properly been said (if Daniel had cared to use the most expressive terms) that Darius of the Medes, breaking into the City, did win the Kingdom; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his force, and to his use. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his works printed at Basile in the year 1559, I find only thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alphensius; that Nabuchodonosor was more valiant than Hercules; that he subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia, as far as to the Armenians; and that, as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his Kingdom, and rapt with divine fury, he cried with a loud voice: O Babylon, I forgive thee of a great calamity that shall come upon you, which neither Bell, nor any of the gods shall avert: There will come a Persian, half an Ass, that shall bring slavery upon you: and that this and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I believe little or nothing, living that Nabuchodonosor knew before-hand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold, from the golden head, to the silver breast. But that he won all Africa or Lybia, I do hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaliger's Copy of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells us, that Nabuchodonosor was both African and Spanish, I believe the fragment to much the less; and am as little moved with the authority of it, where it calls a Median, the pride and confidence of the Affrians; as where it tells of Nebuchadnezzar his own vanishing away. Indeed that same title (of half an Ass) by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable, as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, because his Parentage was more noble on the Mothers side than on the Fathers; as Mules are begotten by Asses upon Mares; And thus much in answer of the two principal foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnity and coherence which it had within it self, I easily allow it. But this proves nothing; for meer fictions have not wanted these commendations: neither can any man believe that one so judicious, industrious, and deeply learned as Joseph Scaliger, would overthrow himself in setting down repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeal. And herein it seems that Scaliger, well knowing his own insufficiency, hath been little careful to satisfy men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the Prophecy of Daniel were true, that the Kingdom of Balthazar was divided, and given to the Medes and Persians; either we must think that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else we must bethink our selves what Persian it might be that shared the Kingdom with him. For it is not more certain, that Balthazar lost his life and Kingdom, than that his Kingdom was divided and given to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to have been Darius, they should be thought to have done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords over all the subject Provinces; inasmuch that the Greek Historians did commonly call those Wars which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made upon Greece, the Wars of the Medes. Yea, to clear this point, even Daniel himself resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, unto a Ram with two horns, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to have been condemned by Joseph Scaliger, for maintaining upon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes was partner with Cyrus, in his victories, and not a Chaldean King by him subdued. Neither was Josephus to be less regarded, for affirming that Balthazar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his Nephew Cyrus; though herein he varied from Berosus and others, whose authority elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Josephus had no reason to believe any mans faith or knowledge of those times half so well as Daniel's, whom I believe that he understood as far as was needful in this case. Lawfully it was for him to allege all Authors that had any mention, though imperfect, of the same things that were contained in the Writing of the Pentateuch, to whose Histories thereby he procured reputation in the R- man world, where they were strangers, and might seem fabulous. Even to Eusebius and other Writers willingly embrace the testimonies of Heathen Books making for the truth in some particulars; yet will they not therefore be tried in general by the self-same Ethnick Philosophers, but leave them where they are against the truth; as Josephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meet to say of Scaliger's opinion in this point; holding nevertheless in due regard his learning and judgment, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had then been very great.

SECT. VI.

What may be held as probable of the Persons and Times of Nabuchodonosor his Successors.

I own weakness, who cannot find how the seventy years of Captivity are to be divided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I find that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly say with Perrerus, that we ought liberally to pardon, those whose feet have failed them in the slippery ways of Chronology, wherein both learning and diligence are subject to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulness, or heedless reckoning. Yet will I adventure to deliver my opinion, wherein the judgment of Lyra and others (holding those only to have reigned over the Chaldeans, whose names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Conjectures before rehearsed. Not that I will take upon me to defend Lyra his Conjectures, when he supposeth by Niriglossor and Laborusardach to be meant the same persons which are called in Scripture Ezraimeroch and Balthazar (for this can by no good colour be maintained); but only to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to have occupied the whole time of seventy years. First therefore let us consider the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth year Jerusalem was taken and sacked, but in his nineteenth laid utterly desolate.

Most of Writers have given to him 43 years of reign, following therein Berosus. There are who have added one year more; and some have made it up 45. To dispute about the certainty were needless: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certain truth.

Manethot is it, that the 19 year of Nebuchadnezzar is joined with the 11 of Zedechias; as at Jos. 51. 12 so that his eighty year was the fifth year of Jeremy. 2 Kings 24. 12 Chania his Captivity; the reign of Zedechias ended at the mean place, being of 11 years. 2 Kings 25. 1 is generally agreed upon, so that it needs no further proofs: As for the beginning of his successor Ezraimeroch, it was in the seven and thirtieth year of Jechonia his Captivity; so that Nebuchadnezzar after his eighth year (which was the first of Jechonia his Bondage) reigned 35 whole years and peradventure a good part of the six and thirtieth, inasmuch as Jechonia was enlarged with so great a favour, not until the end of the year. Subtracting therefore out of these four and forty, which Nebuchadnezzar's reign did well near occupy, those eighteen years of his which passed away before the Captivity of Judah, and ruin of the City, we have remaining fix and twenty years of the Seventy, that were almost wholly spent when his Son began to reign.

It is now to be considered, how the remainder of the seventy years were divided between the Kings ruling in Babylon, until the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needful: the whole sum being certain, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were slothful Princes. Neither can any man the more justly suspect the beginning or end of the whole seventy years; for that the distribution of some part of them is only conjectural; seeing that none who gives any other terms to their beginning or end, hath related to follow both unlikely and desperate conjectures in dividing them. I will therefore be bold to do as others have done; knowing well before-hand, that whosoever shall discover my error, mult do me the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a safe more material) of making me to understand the truth.

Of the four and forty years remaining in account of Nebuchadnezzar's death, we are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then having authority good enough to warrant us from blame of presumption, in giving seventeen years to Ezraimeroch, we find left in our hands to belong unto Balthazar six and twenty years. Of the year belonging unto Darius the Mede, I have already spoken what I thought sufficient, in delivering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this Captivity. That Balthazar did reign seventeen years, we have the authority of Josephus before cited in express words: We have also the general consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who reigned so long, and Balthazar to have been one. But nothing moved me so much to believe this Tradition, as first those evident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third year of Balthazar he followed the Kings business, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his reign (a proof sufficient of no few years passing under this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniel's employments took end either that year or the next). Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his Wars against the Affrians, which beginning with the death of this mans Father, and being always prosperous, could hardly have occupied any longer time; though we make large allowance to his deeds in the lower Asia, which fell out in the mid-way: I have already shewed, that there appears in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the reign of Ezraimeroch was not short, and that men of great judgment have found it most probable, that he was a King three and twenty years. More, I think, they would have allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to be wished, that Books of such antiquity, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yield in many dark passages of Antiquity. I will yet confess, that were his works never so excellent, and in all things else unquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend unto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemy: How much less ought I obey a broken fragment of his, containing only seven or eight lines, and part even of the title corrupted, as they believe that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures have told us, that God gave gave the Empire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his Son, and to his Sons Son: How long each of them held it, we find not Express'd; yet would we gladly know it of Berosus, or of any other that would teach us, provided always, that helping us in a particularity, he destroyed not thereby the general truth. More words are needless. It is enough to say that, which Berosus, or Josaphus who cited him, hath been wronged by the carelessness of Scribes; and that it was as easy for those Scribes to err in writing two for six and twenty, as for three and twenty, or perhaps more easy. For, the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character β , signifying 6, hath a nearer resemblance of β than stands for 2, than hath γ , which is used for 3. So that the Numerical notes β 5, expressing 26, were not far enough from being mistaken in the true Copy, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not unusual, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seem not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in standing for 23, I do not well perceive. As for the Arithmetical figures now in use, they were long after the time of Josaphus brought in by the Astronomers, and therefore do not appertain unto this business: unless we should guess that his works were corrupted in that unlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the Studies of Humanity, but in a sort wholly given over to the doctrine of Aristotle. If to which will serve to make Berosus our friend, so let it be; If not, I will not purchase the favour of his authority, by forsaking Jeremy and Daniel, when they seem to be his Opposites.

SECT. VII.

Of the Victories which Nabuchodonosor obtained between the destruction of Jerusalem, and conquest of Egypt.

With what actions this time of seventy years was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few have written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peradventure have been some cause that the time it self was, and is yet, sought to be abridged, as not having left sufficient matter to witness the length of it. But by such an argument we might as well deny to many people even their Being. For every Nation (I know not whom I should except) between the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slothful age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no marvel, if the posterity of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things ready to their hand, which their hearts could have desired, betook themselves to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the Prodigal Sons of greedy Fathers, their own wisdom greater, which knew how to enjoy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their days in the restless travel of purchasing: Though indeed the reign of Nabuchodonosor was so divided, that his youthful and stronger years having been exercised in victorious arms, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthy labours past. The nineteenth year of his reign it was, when destroying utterly the great and mighty City of Jerusalem, he enriched himself with abundance of Spoil, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearful example. From that time forward, he, until his three and twentieth year, laboured in the Conquest of those adjoining Regions, which God had exposed unto his Sword, and commanded to wear his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Mobabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sydanians, and Egyptians; though some of these were already become his followers, and served under him, when Jerusalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrians, whose City was founded on an Island, safe enough from any danger of a Land-army, and whose Fleet was so strong, that they needed not to fear any enemy at Sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour-Cities, nor with the obstinate resolution of this mighty Prince, employing all his power to their subversion.

That the City of Tyre was rather well pleased, than any way discouraged with the fall of Jerusalem, (which had held the same course that Tyre did), and endured all that might be in the same quarrel against the common enemy) it appears by the words which Ezekiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrrus; Alas, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned unto me; for seeing the is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at length, even in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, that great work of his, wherewith we have already spoken, began to appear above the waters, and threaten them with inevitable mischief.

But those Prophecies of Jeremy and of Isaiah, which appoint unto this delatation of Tyre the same term of seventy years, that was prescribed unto the reign of the Chaldeans, do plainly shew that the followed Jerusalem, the same nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like fortune. The particularities which doubtless were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner utterly lost. Thus much we find, That the Citizens perceiving the Town unable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fled into the life of Cyprus. Nevertheless, it seems that this evasion served only the principal men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer sort unto the enemies fury. For, not only such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent, (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which, with excessive labour, the Affrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus Nabuchodonosor caused his Army to force a great Sea, vice against Tyrrus, wherein every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare; yet had he no wages, nor his Army; but was fain to rest contented with the honour of having destroyed that City, which in all mens judgments had been held invincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerful Cities, having made the name of the Chaldeans dreadful in the ears of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonosor used the advantage of that reputation which he had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with less pain. The Kingdom of Egypt was the mark at which he aimed; a Country so abounding in all riches and pleasures, that it might well have tempted any Prince, finding himself strong enough, to seek occasion of quarrel against it; and so far an enemy to the Crown of Babylon, that had it been poorer, yet either it must have been subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill have been established. Ver-

SECT. VIII.

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning, slain by Nabuchodonosor, contrary to the opinion of most Authors, who following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate it otherwise.

When by a long course of Victory, Nabuchodonosor had brought into subjection all the Nations of Syria, and the bordering Arabians, in such wife, that no enemy to himself, nor friend to the Egyptian, was left at his back, that might give impediment unto his proceeding, or take advantage of any misfortune; then did he forthwith take in hand the Conquest of Egypt himself, upon which those other Nations had formerly been depending. Of this Expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets, Isaiah, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, have written so plainly, that I hold it altogether needless to look after more authority, or to cite for proof half of that which may be alleged out of these. Nevertheless, we find many Authors, who following Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to strain their Prophecies with unreasonable diligence unto such a sense, as gives to Nabuchodonosor little more than the honour of having done some spoil in Egypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a Chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affairs. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the means and second helps conducing to their purpose, that oftentimes they do prefer the Commentator before the Authors; and to uphold a sentence, giving testimony to one clause, do carelessly overthrow the History it self, which thereby they thought to have maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former Book: but that which they have spoken of Apries, was purposely reserved unto this place. Herodotus doth affirm, that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; (unless we should understand that he was victorious in the War, which he is said to have made upon Tyrrus and Sidon) that he reigned five and twenty years; and was finally taken and put to death by his own Subjects; who did set up Amasis as King, which prevailed against him. The rebellion of the Egyptians he imputeth to a great loss which they received in an Expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Army was destroyed. This calamity the people of Egypt thought to be well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous Expedition, with a purpose to have them consumed, that so he might with greater security reign over such as stayed at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slain, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appease the tumult; but Amasis became Captain of the Rebels, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented unto this new Election; whereby Apries was driven to trust unto his foreign Mercenaries, the Isomians and Carians, of whom he kept continually in readiness thirty thousand good Soldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were at length vanquished by the great number of the Egyptian forces, amounting unto two hundred and fifty thousand.

vertheless it was needful, that before he entered into this business, the Countries adjacent should be reduced unto such terms, that either they should wholly stand at his devotion, or at least be unable to work him any displeasure. And herein the Decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of State. For the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazar, and other adjoining Regions, whom God for their fins had condemned to fall under the Babylonian swords, were such as regarding only their own gain, had some of them, like Ravens, followed the Chaldean Army, to feed upon the carcasses that fell by the cruelty thereof; others taking advantage of their neighbours miseries, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor: all of them thinking, that when the Affrian had satisfied his fury, he should be fain to forsake those desolate parts, and leave the possession of them to that he could lay hand upon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philistines had shewed much malice to the Tyrrus when their City was taken. What good service they had done to the Chaldeans, we find not: if they did any, it is likely to have been with reference to their own purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to rejoice at the fall of Jerusalem, but presently they entered upon the Country of Gad, and took possession; as if not the Affrians; but they had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceive what other ground that practice had of Baal King of the Ammonites, when he sent Ismael, a Prince of the blood of Judah, to murder Gedaliah, whom the King of Babel had left Governour over those that remained in Israel, and to carry captive unto the Ammonites Country the people that abode in Manasse, than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his own Country, and abandon those wasted Lands to himself and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like policy the Mobabites did exercise, whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God; and their diffimulation condemned, as not doing right.

All these Nations had the art of ravening, which is familiar to such as live or border upon deserts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the uttermost cunning of their thievish wits. But Nabuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their devices by sharp and sudden war, overwhelming them with unexpected ruin, as it were in one night; according to the Prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, who foretold, with little difference of words, the greatness and swiftness of the misery that should come upon them. With which of them he first began, I find not; it seems that Moab was the last which felt his hand: for so do many good Authors interpret the Prophecy of Isaiah, threatening Moab with destruction after three years, as having reference to the third year following the ruin of Jerusalem; the next year after it, being spent in the Egyptian Expedition. This is manifest, that all the principal Towns in these Regions were burnt, and the people slain, or made slaves, few excepted, who being preserved by flight, had not the courage to return to their habitations over-hastily, much less to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor; but lived as miserable Out-laws, or at least oppressed wretches, until the end of seventy years; which God had prescribed unto the destruction of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Judah.

land, which were all by birth and education, men of War. Apries himself being taken prisoner, was gently entreated by Amasis for a while, until the Egyptians, exclaiming upon him, as an extreme enemy to the Land, got him delivered into their hands, and strangled him, yet they gave him honourable Burial. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whom Nebuchadrezzar doth nearly agree; telling us, that Apries did vanquish the Cyprians and Phoenicians in battle at Sea, took by force and demolished Sidon, won the other Towns of Phœnicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally perished, as is before rehearsed, when he had reigned two and twenty years. This authority were enough (yet not more than enough) to inform us of Apries his history, if greater authority did not contradict it. But the destruction of Egypt by the Babylonians, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compel our belief, than have the Traditions of Egyptian Priests (which the Greek Historians followed) and greater probabilities to persuade that look only into human reasons. For Isaiah prophesied long before of the shameful Captivity of the Egyptians, whom the King of Abyssinia, would carry away naked, young and old, in such wile, that the Jews, who fled then for deliverance from the Affrian, should be ashamed of their own vain confidence in men to be able to defend themselves.

But Ezekiel and Jeremy, as their Prophecies were nearer to the time of execution, they handled this argument more precisely. For Ezekiel telleth plainly, that Egypt should be given to Nebuchadrezzar as wages for the service which he had done at Tyre: Alas he recounteth particularly all the chief Cities in Egypt, saying, That these by name should be destroyed, and be taken into Captivity; yea, that Pharaoh and all his Army should be slain by the sword. Wherefore it must needs be a violent expiation of these Prophecies, which by applying the issue of such threatenings to an insurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasis did succeed unto Apries, by force indeed, but by the uniform consent of all the people. Certainly, if that notable place of Jeremy, wherein he foretelleth how the Jew in Egypt should be delivered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekiah had been, were to be referred unto the time of that rebellion, whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the general opinion hath overlooked it; then was it vainly done of the same Prophet (which God forbid that any Christian should thinke, seeing he laboured by the appointment of God himself) to hide in the clay of a Brick-hill, those very bones, upon which the Throne of Nabuchodonosor should be set, and his Pavilion spread. Yea then was that Prophecy no other than false, which expressed the end of Pharaoh thus: Behold, I will cut the common people of No, and Pharaoh and Egypt, with their gods, and their Kings, even Pharaoh, and all that trust in him: and I will deliver them into the hands of those that seek their lives, and into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar, King of Babel, and into the hands of his servants. The clearness of this Prophecy being such as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greek Historians, Wherefore looking upon Junius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hephra to be Amasis and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Egyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus with lies, coined upon a vain-glorious purpose of hiding their own disgrace and bondage. And surely it may well be thought, that the history of Nebuchadrezzar was better known to the Jews, whom it concerned, than to the Greeks, that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather believe Josephus, reporting that Nabuchodonosor in the three and twentieth year of his reign, and the fifth year of the destruction of Jerusalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead, than Herodotus or Diodore; who being meer strangers to this business, had no great reason to labour in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting aside all advantage of authority, we should only consider the relations of Josephus, and of the Greek Historians, as either of them might be verified of it self by apparent circumstances, without reflecting upon the Hebrew Prophets, or Egyptian Priests; methinks the death of Apries can no way be approved, as having been wrought by consent of the people, but affords great matter of suspicion; yea, though no man had opposed the reports of Herodotus and Diodore. For the great love and honour which the Egyptians did bear unto their Kings, is notorious by the uniform testimony of all others that have handled the matters of that Country, as well as by the report of Diodore himself. How then can we think it probable, that Apries having won great Victories, did for one only loss fall into the hatred of all his people? or, which may serve to persuade us, that a King of Egypt would seek, or do demean himself, that he might be thought to seek the destruction of his natural subjects? As for that Army of thirty thousand Soldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King of Egypt, whom Amasis took prisoner, is said to have kept for his defence: Doth it not argue that he was a foreigner, and one that armed himself against the Egyptians, wishing them few and weak; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as assuredly their own, as the strength of their own bodies? It were more tedious than any way needful, to use all Arguments that might be alleged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamors of the people obtained of Amasis, who fought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that he was some foreign Governor, not a natural Prince; otherwise the people would have desired to live his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, whereunto I should not have yielded, though it had stood upon great appearance of truth, considering that the voice of truth it self cries out against it; but leave the circumstances, proving the Conquest of Egypt by Nabuchodonosor, to be observed where due occasion in course of the story following shall present them.

SECT. IX.

How Egypt was subdued and held by Nebuchadrezzar.

IT is a great loss, that the general History of the World hath suffered by the spoil and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments that should have have preserved the memory of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mighty Prince Nabuchodonosor; wherein, whether his Virtue, or Fortune were greater, it is now uncertain. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Provinces, were such as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all the former Wars he had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckoneth up in his thirty Chapter (besides the whole Country of Egypt) Plur and Lud, with other Nations, that may seem to have reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these Wars are in a manner utterly lost; but that the victory was easy and swift, any man shall find, who will take the pains to confer the places wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I think worthy of more particular observation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Book) thought himself most safe in Egypt by the well-ordered situation of his Country, did very unwisely in suffering his enemies to sweep the way clean unto his own doors, by confining all his friends and adherents in Syria. For, as the labour of this business did more harden, than weary the Chaldean Army; so the confidence and vain security of the Egyptians, relying upon the difficult passages which the enemy was to make through the Arabian deserts, and the much advantage which the great River of Nile would afford unto themselves, did little avail them in provision for the War, and much astonish them (as may justly be thought) in the time of execution: it being usually seen, that the hearts of men, when those helps fail, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their own virtue. Hitherto the Kingdom of Egypt had flourished under the rule of the Pharaohs about a thousand five hundred and fourscore years; but from this time forward it remained forty years without a King, under the subjection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recover by little and little the former greatness; yet so, that it was never deadlier unto others; God having said of that people, I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath been said of Pharaoh, I am the son of the wife, I am the son of the ancient King: Amasis as he had boasted, The River is mine, and I have made it. The Princes of Egypt now became fools, the River failed them, the King himself was taken and slain, and that ancient lineage quite extinguished. This came to pass in the fifth year after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the three and twentieth year of Nebuchadrezzar; at which time (saith Josephus) He slew the King then reigning, placed another in his room, and carried Captives thence to Babylon the Jews whom he found in that Country. Now concerning the time which Josephus gives unto this business, and the business it self, I have already shewed, that it is warranted by all the Prophecies which intimate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Jerusalem, and carrying away those unto Babel who inhabited the ruinable ruins of that great City, which was in the same three and twentieth year of Nebuchadrezzar, is not improbably thought by good Authors to have been at the return from this Egyptian Expedition. But whereas Josephus tells us, that there was another King put in the room of Apries, by Nebuchadrezzar, we must understand, that he was only a Vice-roy, and not (as some have mistaken it) think that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his reign in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadrezzar, were as well repugnant unto the Prophecies before alleged, as to all Chronology and History. Some there are, which to help this inconvenience, imagine that there were two successively bearing the name of Amasis; others that there were two Apries, the one slain by Nebuchadrezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is only about a name, it being once granted, that the person mentioned in Scripture was deprived of Life and Kingdom by the Affrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceive, that Apries of whom the Greek Historians wrote, could not be the Deputy of Nebuchadrezzar, seeing that he was the Grand-child of Pharaoh Necho, and made War (as they report) upon the Phœnicians, who were before the Egyptians become subject unto the Crown of Babylon. I might add, perhaps, that he whom Nebuchadrezzar left as Governour of Egypt, was more likely to have had some Chaldean or Affrian, than Egyptian name, unless we should think that he had been a Traitor to his natural Prince, and to rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Country: about which it were but frivolous to dispute. Thus much in brief we ought to believe, that Nabuchodonosor made an absolute Conquest of Egypt; that he was not so foolish as to give it away, any man may guess; that he appointed one to rule the Country, it is consequent unto the former, and hath authority of Josephus; that his Governour (or some successor of his) was afterwards taken and slain by Amasis. I see probability enough to persuade me self; and yet can well be content, that others use their liberty, and believe what they list. As for the Army which this Egyptian King Apries is supposed to have kept of Ionians and Carians, I hold them to be no other than the Garisons of Mercenary Soldiers which were left by the Affrian for the guard of his Vice-roy, and custody of the new subdued Province: as likewise the company returning from Cyrene and Bæce, who together with the friends of such as were slain at that Expedition, remembered before out of the Greek Historians, deplored and slew Apries; I take them to have been the Egyptian fugitives, which then recovered their own Country. Sure it is, that this Prophecy of Ezekiel was verified; At Evg 30. the end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians 30. 14. from the people where they were scattered, and I will bring again the captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to return into the land of Pharos, into the land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small Kingdom. If the Egyptian Priests alluded hereto in the tale which they made of Amasis obtaining the Kingdom, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they deviated matter that had no shadow of truth, only to keep the Greeks from knowledge of their Country's disgrace, then are they little to be regarded, since we know the truth with them.

SECT. X.

Of the sundry accounts drawn from sundry authors of Nebuchadrezzar, and of the destruction of Ninive by him; and the time of which action is uncertain.

THESE Victories brought the greatness of the Affrian Empire to the full, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadrezzar's reign in sundry places of Scripture. To speak any more of the questions arising about the supposition of Nebuchadnezzar's times, might seem to be the over-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note, that whereas David was carried Captive in the third year of Jehoiakim's reign (which run a long with some part of Nebuchadnezzar's first year) and was kept in diet three years more, before he was brought into the Kings presence; It could not be the second of Nebuchadnezzar's Kingdom, wherein he interpreted the forgotten dream of the great Image, fore-shewing the success of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The fame or the like may be said of divers places which refer sundry matters unto their let years; as that of Ezekiel before cited, where he foretells, that Egypt should be given in reward for the service done before Tyrus, dating his Prophecy in the seven and twentieth year; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth year: for these years held no dependence upon either the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's Kingdom, or of his Empire, nor yet upon any of the Captivities, but had reference to some memorable actions, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easy to be found, nor worth the labour of uncertain search.

Of any War made by Nebuchadnezzar, after such time as he returned from the Conquest of Egypt, I do not read, excepting that against Nineve, the destruction whereof was foretold by the Prophet Nabum. Nineve had long before been taken by Mitradach (as in due place hath been shewed) and together with the rest of Affria made subject to Babylon. Yet was it left under a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldean, as Jehoiakim and Zedechias, tributary Kings of Judah had done, tasted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Nineve followed the Conquest of Egypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nabum the Prophet made between this City that was to fall, and the City of No in Egypt, that was fallen already. But how long after this came to pass, it is (methinks) impossible to find out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronology, that it was in the first of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, the place of Nabum last cited, is enough to disprove it. Whereas it is referred by some unto the first of his Monarchy, which began at the end of the Egyptian Wars; the whole Prophecy of Nabum, which went between the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very year of this destruction, or other circumstances of the War, whether managed by Nabuchodonosor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like unto the vain curiosity of Tiberius Cæsar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba, or to the like idle pains which he should take, who would seek to learn what woman that Hazzab Queen of Nineve was, whose woful Captivity the same Prophet Nabum likewise did foretell.

SECT. XI.

Of the latter time of Nebuchadnezzar; his buildings, madnes, and death.

OF the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I think there are no Monuments extant, save those which we find among the Prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great works of Babylon, wherewith he pleased himself so well, that he brake out into those glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I have built, for the house of the Kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Majesty? Surely it those things be true that are by Josephus rehearsed of him out of Berosus an Assyrian, he might well delight himself with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall, that besides other stately works, he raised those huge Arches wherewith were born up the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the Air, and equalling the tops of Mountains; which most sumptuous Frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Affrian, and all the Perfian Empire, is said to have been reared, and finished in fifteen days.

But of all this and other his magnificence, we find little else recorded, than that (which indeed is most profitable for us to consider) his over-valuing of his own greatness, abated him unto a condition inferior to the poorest of men. And not undeservingly fell these judgments of God upon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not only with many Victories, and much happiness in his own life, but with a discovery of things to come after him, yea and had approved the certainty of his dream, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet; he nevertheless became so forgetful of God, whose wonderful power he had seen and acknowledged, that he caused a golden Image to be set up and worshipped; ordaining a cruel death as reward unto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was utterly repugnant to the Law of him that is the King of Kings.

Hereof St. Hierom hath well noted; *Vexos obliuio variat, ut qui dudum servum Dei quasi Deum adoraverat, nunc statuum sibi fieri jubet, ut ipse quasi Deus in Statua adoraretur: A basily forgetfulness of the truth, that he who so lately had worshipped (Daniel) the servant of God, as if he had been God himself, should now command a Statua to be erected unto himself, wherein himself might be worshipped as God. From this impiety it pleased God to reclaim him, by the strange and wonderful delivery of those blessed Saints out of the fiery furnace; who being thrown into it bound, for refusing to commit idolatry, were assisted by an Angel; preserved from all harm of the fire; loosened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and restored to their former honour by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this devotion of Nebuchadnezzar, was not so rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit unchangeable in his hasty zeal. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dream of the terrible judgment hanging over his head, which Daniel expounding, advised him to break off his sin by righteousness, and his iniquity by mercy towards the poor, that there might be an healing of his error. Hereby it seems that injustice and cruelty were the faults for which he was threatened: but this threatening sufficed not unto his information. For that so great a Monarch should be driven from among men (according to the tenor of the dream and interpretation); yet compelled to dwell with the beasts of the field, and made to eat grags as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans judgment, that easily it might be thought an idle dream; and much more easily be forgotten at the years end. One whole years leisure to repent, was given to this haughty Prince: which respite of* execution may seem to have bred in him a forgetfulness of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelve months, walking in the royal Palace of Babel, he was so overjoyed and transported with a vain contemplation of his own seeming happiness, that without all fear of Gods heavy judgment pronounced against him, he uttered those lofty words before rehearsed, in vaunting of the Majestical works which he had reared, as well becoming his Majestical person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voice from Heaven, telling him that his Kingdom was departed from him, rehearsed over unto him the sentence again, which was fulfilled upon him the very same hour.

That Solomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, have taken delight in their own buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I do not remember that ever I have read of any, that were punished for rejoicing in works of this kind (though it is hard in joy or any passion of the mind, to keep a just measure) excepting only this Nebuchadnezzar.

The like may be said of David: for other (and some very goodly) Kings have directed all their forces to the very last man; but few or none have been known to have been punished as David was. Surely I not only hold it lawful to rejoice in those good things wherewith God hath blessed us; but a note of much unthankfulness to entertain them with a sullen and unfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reverence to God is wanting, are no better than obscure clouds hindering the influence of that blessed Light, which clarifies the soul of man, and predispoleth it unto the brightness of eternal felicity; so that insolent joy, which man in the pride of his vain imagination conceiveth of his own worth, cloth above all other passions blunt our minds, as it were with lightning, and make us to reflect our thoughts upon our seeming inherent Greatness, forgetting the whilst him, to whom we are indebted for our very Being. Wherefore these Mala mentis gaudia, The evil joys of the mind were not unaptly, by the Prince of Latin Poets, bestowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed farther inward than sorrows, cares, and fears, not far from the Iron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no unlikely token of vengeance near at hand, when these unreasonable flashes of proud and vain joy, do rage in a mind, that should have been humbled with a just repentance, and acknowledgement of ill deserving.

This was verified upon Nebuchadnezzar, whose punishment was singular and unexampled. For he ran among beasts in the fields and woods, where for seven years he lived, not only as a salvage man, but as a salvage beast; for a beast he thought himself, secundum suam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed himself in the same manner, and with the same food that beasts do. Not that he was changed in figure external, according to Mediana, inasmuch as he appeared a beast to other mens eyes, as St. Hierom in the life of Hilarion (how true God knows) speaks of a Woman that appeared to all other mens sight as a Cow, but to Hilarion only a Woman; neither was he changed as Iphigenia the daughter of Agamemnon was said to be, into a Hind; nor made a Monster, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to St. Hierom's expolition of these words, At the same time was my understanding removed unto him. Sec. Quando dicit (saith St. Hierom) sensum sibi reddidit, ostendit me formam se assumpsisse mentem; When he saith that his sense was re- moved unto him, he shewed that he had not left his humane shape, but his understanding. Seven years expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his understanding, and his estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confiding his power, and elevating being; that he was the Lord of Heaven and Earth, and wrought without reluctance what he pleased in both; that his works were all truth, and his ways righteous. Which gave argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his salvation; namely St. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyra, Carthasianus, and others. And for that place of Isaiah the 14, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforementioned Authors apply the same to Balthazar; because Isaiah both in the 13 and 14 Chap. speaketh of the Kings, and the destruction of Babylon jointly.

SECT. XII. OF EVILMERODACH.

HAVING already spoken what I could of the succession and years of Nebuchadnezzar's posterity; the most that may be said of him, is said of Evilmerodach, which I will not here again rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his Father had gotten; and left his Kingdom burning in a War that consumed it to ashes. He lost Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth year of his reign, which was forty years after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the account of Herodotus, who allows to Amasis four and forty years of reign; nor with that of Diodorus, who gives him five and fifty, saying, that he died in the third year of the threecore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but seven and thirty years, which passed between the second year of the four and fiftieth Olympiad (which was the nineteenth of Evilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fifth of Cambyses his reign, wherein he van Egypt; of which seven and thirty years it is credibly held, that Phammiticus, the Son of Amasis, reigned three: so that Amasis could be no longer King than four and thirty years. But seeing that these two Greek Historians have been abused by Egyptian Priests in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no marvel though they were also deceived in the length of his reign. This is the plain answer to this objection. For to say, either that the numbers were mis-written, and four and forty fell down instead of four and thirty; or that Amasis did temporize a while with the Affrians, and not bear himself as absolute King of Egypt, until the nineteenth of Evilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath been proved out of Ezekiel, that Egypt became again a Kingdom) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Egyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes, to deal with Evilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame and reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces, or whether (as I rather think) some foil received by the Affrian invading Media, emboldened the Egyptians to rebel against him; I will neither undertake, nor seek to define. Xenophon tells, Xenoph. Cyrop. that the first service of young Cyrus in War, was under Astages King of the Medes, his Grandfather, in a prosperous fight against the Affrian Prince, Prince, who did live upon him; at which time, Cyrus was fifteen or sixteen years old. If therefore Cyrus lived threecore and three years (as he is said to have died well stricken in years) which is held to be the ordinary term of no short life, then was this encounter in the third year of Ezimiradach his reign. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the War began more early between these Nations, forasmuch as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances insinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gave courage unto those that had felt him a troublesome neighbour, to stand upon prouder terms with the Affrians, than in his flourishing estate they durst have used. Howsoever the quarrel began, we find that it ended not before the last ruin of the Affrian Monarchy. For the Babylonians, being too proud to digest the losses which he received by the Medes, and their Allies the Perfians, drew unto his party the Lydians, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong persuasions, hoping so to overwhelm his enemies with a strong invasion, whom in vain he had sought to weary out with a lingering War.

This happened after the death of Ahyager, who left the world in the nineteenth year of Ezimiradach, at which time Amasis took possession of Egypt. So that the Affrians having his hands already full of business, which more earnestly did affect him, seems thereby to have given the better means unto the Egyptians of new erecting their Kingdom, which by long distance of place, did sundry times find occasion to rebel in after-ages, and set up a King within it self, against the far more mighty Perfians.

The issue of these great preparations made by Ezimiradach against the Medes, was such as opened the way unto the fulfilling of those Prophecies, which many years before uttered against Babel, by Isaiah and Jeremy.

For the Affrians and their Confederates, who trusting in their numbers, thought to have buried the Medes and Perfians under their thick showers of arrows and darts, were encountered with an Army of stout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battle, wherein Ezimiradach was slain. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had raised and upheld, being shaken and grievously cracked under his unfortunate Son, was left to be sustained by his unworthy Nephew; a man more likely to have overthrown it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repair it, when it was in way of falling.

SECT. XIII.

A private conjecture of the Author, serving to make good those things which are cited out of Berosus, concerning the Successors of Ezimiradach, without wrong to the truth. The quality, and death of Balthasar.

Though I have already (as it seems to me) sufficiently proved that Balthasar was the Son, and immediate Successor to Ezimiradach, yet considering earnestly the conjectures of those Writers, which following Berosus, insert Niglissar, or Nirgissaroor, and his Son Labsassardach between them;

as also that which I find in Herodotus, of Nitocris a famous Queen of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that City; I have thought it not superfluous herein in this place to shew by what means it was possible, that some error might have crept into the History of those times, and thereby have brought us to a needless trouble of searching out the truth, as it were by candle-light, in the uncertain fragments of lost Authors, which we might have found by day-light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First therefore I observe, that the time which Berosus divides betwixt Ezimiradach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the years in which Nabuchodonosor lived wild among brute beasts in the open field; Secondly, that the suddenness of this accident, which came in one hour, could not but work much perturbation in that State, wherein doubtless the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamity pitied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause which promised his recovery, as being verified in that which had been more incredible. Now if we do in common reason judge, what course was like to be taken by the great Ones of the Kingdom, for settling the Government, whilst the King was thus distracted, we shall find it most likely, that his Son and Heir did occupy the Royal Throne, with condition to restore it unto his Father, when God should enable him to repossess it. In this his rule Ezimiradach being to supply the utter want of understanding in his Father, as Protectors do the unripe of it in young but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the intolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small ability of Government, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when he held it in his own right. That his Sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his Sister) was a Woman of high spirit, it appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying, That she was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and useful works about the River of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Towns from the Affrians, and amongst them Nitocris. Wherefore it were not unreasonable to think, that such a Woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her Brothers mis-government, used practices to get the rule into her own hands, and afterwards, as a Mother, to leave it unto her ungracious Son. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could have reigned, we do not find; but we find in Berosus (as Josephus hath cited him) that Niglissar who got the Kingdom from Ezimiradach, was his Sisters Husband; which proves that this to have been the same Woman. As for Labsassardach the Son of Niglissar, if at the end of nine months reigned, he were for his leud conditions slain by the Nobility, as the same Berosus reporteth; it seems that God prepared hereby the way for Nabuchodonosor's restitution (whose term of punishment was then expired) by raising such trouble, as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here use many words to confute that which Berosus hath further set down of Ezimiradach, telling us that he was slain by his Sisters Husband: For the plain words of the Scripture, naming the year wherein he got liberty to Trebuchon, do plainly testify that he out-lived the three or four and fortieth year of his Fathers reign, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to have succeeded Ezimiradach in the Kingdom, dom, might indeed have so done, though not when he held it in his own right. Of Balthasar, who was his Son and Heir, we find that he had such conditions as God permitted to be in a King for the ruin of the people. He was from his young years of a mischievous nature; having in his Fathers time slain a Noble young man that should have married his Sister, only for spite and envy to see him kill two wild beasts in hunting, at which himself having thrown his javelin had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beauty, said, It were a happy woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous villanies caused many which had loved his Father (as a good and gracious, though unfortunate Prince) to revolt from him unto the enemy as soon as he was King. Neither do I find that he performed any thing worthy of record, but as a coward and a fool he lost all; fitting ill, and not once daring to give battle to them that daily took from him what from him. Yet carefully feasting when danger had hemmed him in on every side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom he had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a fool taken in unexcusable security, yet had not that happiness, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of fear, but was terrified with a dreadful Vision, which had shewed his ruin not in many hours before, even whilst he was drinking in that Wine, which the fowls of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest blood. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable reign of seventeen years, he perished like a beast, and was slain as he deserved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath been spoken heretofore; in matter of his affairs, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose story, that of Balthasar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the Original and first greatness of the Persians.

SECT. I.

That the Medes were the chief actors in the subversion of the Babylonian Empire.

The Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Babylon, the Empire of Babylon, and of Affria, was joined first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Affria, and of Media it self.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings besides himself, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Provincial Governours having cut down the last branch of Ninus in Sardapalus, divided between them the Eastern Empire. Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two years after that the Line of Belochus was ended in Babylon; the Dominions as well of the Conquerors, as of the conquered, fell to a third Family, namely to Cyrus of the house of Achamenes; the Princes of which blood reigning in Persia, had formerly been dependants on the Medes, and were of little power at home, as of fame abroad in the world.

Of the Family of the Achamenes, and Line of the Perfian Kings, we shall hereafter find occasion in due place to intrate.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madias the third Son of Japhet. That they had Kings from after the Flood, Lactantius and Diodorus have found record; For Lactantius remembereth an ancient King of the Medes called Hysdaspes; and Diodore speaketh of Pharnus with his seven Sons, slain by the Affrians in the beginning of their Empire.

But of those who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Affrians, I take the list and number from Enschius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I have spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these:

Arbaces	28 years.
Sorjanus	30 years.
Medius	40 years.
Cardaces	13 years.
Duets	53 years.
Phaortes	24 years.
Cyaxares	32 years.
Ahyages	38 years.
Darius Medus

And though the Greeks ascribe the Conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach us, that Darius was not only King of Media, and had the Perfians his followers; but that the Army victorious over Balthasar, was his; as the Affrians and Babylonian Empire also was, during his own life. For we find in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes took the Kingdom, being threecore and two years old: And further, what Officers it pleased him to set over the Kingdom. And so was it prophesied by Isaiah long before: Behold, I will sit up the Medes against them, &c. And by Jeremy 13. 25. 17. 51. 25. 1. 11. 25.

The Lord hath raised up the spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and 28. ver. Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. Their Scriptures Julius Africanus doth well open, who taking authority from Diodore, Cassius, Thalys, and others, delivereth, that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to reign; which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subdued by the Perfians, so before that, both the Perfians and Affrians were marked by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Justin and Herodotus are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

SECT. II.

By what means the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

How the Kingdom of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians; But rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of those who give the Conquest of Babel to the Persians only. For some there are who deny that Ahyages had any other Successor than Cyrus, his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesius on the contrary side affirmeth, that Cyrus was no way descended from Ahyages (whom he called Ahyas or Apasia) but only that having vanquished him in battle, and confined him to Babylonia, he married his Daughter Amytis. But I find the relations of Ctesius often cited, and seldom followed, and himself sometimes very justly reprov'd of wilful untruth.

Viginti, a diligent and learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Ahyages had no such Son as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirm this opinion the more, he citeth Diadore, Justin, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Socrates, and before them, Cassio, Thales, and Phelegon; who do not find any such Successor. Neither do Tacitus, Seneca, Alexander, Julius, Africanus, Clement, Alexandrinus, Justin, Morisy, Lactantius, Enchiridion, St. Hieron, St. Augustin, make report out of any faithful Author by them read, that hath given other Son or Successor to Ahyages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument, ab authoritate negativa, doth never infer conclusion; we may be the bolder (all this great list of noble Writers by him alleged notwithstanding) to affirm, that either Ahyages himself must have been Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; or else to give him some other successor, according to Josephus and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifest, and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chief, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest; Cyrus during his life, being no other than the Lieutenant of his Army, and subject to his authority; the strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassals of Darius, being joyn'd together to compound it.

But it is very certain, that the honour of that great victory over Babylon was wholly given to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and fore-named by God himself for this action; but for the delivery of his Church; a greater work not only in the eyes of God, than the subversion of any State or Monarchy by powerful force.

And it may well be thought, that the Soldiers employed in that service did rather ascribe the glory to him that was the best man of war, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling upon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his posterity, did much augment the fame of his virtue; which among prophane Historians over-grew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because he was old, and did nothing in person; as also because he soon after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was possessor of whatsoever belonged to Darius, before the fame of any such King or Conqueror was carried far off.

And for the Greek Historians, they took all things from the relation of the Persians, who gave to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equal. Only Daniel in the fifth, sixth, and sixth Chapters of his Prophecy, makes it plain, that himself not only lived a great Officer under King Darius, but that he continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus, which being the year of Daniel's death, could not have been distinguished from the reign of Darius; if they had begun together and reigned jointly. Neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdom by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus began after him.

SECT. III.

Xenophon's relation of the War which the Medes and Persians made with joint forces upon the Assyrians and others.

These Testimonies of the Scriptures, which need no other confirmation, are yet made more open to our understanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these Wars: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Assyrian had enlarged his Empire with Victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries; he began to hope that if the Medes could be brought under his subjection, there should not then be left any Nation adjoining, able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field three-score thousand Foot, and ten thousand Horse; to which the forces of Persia being joyn'd, made an exceeding strong Army.

The Assyrian considering the strength of such a Neighbour, invited Croesus King of Lydia, a Prince very mighty both in men and treasure, and with him other Lords of Asia the less, to his assistance, alledging, that those Eastern Nations were very powerful, and so firmly conjoined by leagues, and many alliances, that it would not be calie, no not possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements, and strengthened with great Presents, he drew to himself so many adherents, as he compounded an Army of Two hundred thousand Foot, and three-score thousand Horse; of which, ten thousand Horse, and forty thousand Foot were led by Croesus, who had great cause of enmity with the Medes, in regard of the War made by them against his Father Ahyages: But this great Army was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus General of the Persian forces, utterly broken. Upon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slain, so many of the Assyrians revolted, as Babylon it self could not longer be assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great sums of Money out of Asia the less, Egypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered force, were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his advantage, posselt himself of a great part of the lesser Asia; at which time it was, as I take it, that Croesus himself was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soon after, the Army lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon called Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his Sisters Son, prevailed against Balthasar, as in due time shall be set down.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him levied, are numbered thirty thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest rest of the common foot were Archers, or such as used the Dart or Sling: So far Xenophon.

Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the pattern of a most Heroical Prince, with much Poetical addition: so it can not be denied but that the bulk and grofs of his Narration was founded upon meer Historical truth.

Neither can it indeed be affirmed of any like Writers, that in every speech and circumstance he hath precisely tyed himself to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion: but borrowed in each out of his own invention, appropriating the fame to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Moral and Politick discourses, and examining but the History of things done, it will easily appear, that Xenophon hath handled his undertaken subject, in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any sort corrupted the body.

SECT. IV.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times foregoing this great War.

For it is commonly agreed upon, that Achaemenes, the Son of Perfes, being Governour of Persia, did associate himself with Arbaces, who commanded in Media, in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victory obtained, held for himself the Dominion of those Countries which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; as also that they conveyed over the same honour and power to their posterity: which in Media was not absolutely Regal, but with some restraint limited, until such time as Deioctes took upon him the full authority and majesty of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the reign of Deioctes, are usually accounted about an hundred and forty years; in the last sixty whereof, there reigned in Assyria mighty Princes, namely, Salmanassar and his Successors; whole great achievements in Syria and elsewhere, witness, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their advantage to undertake any offensive War against those victorious Kings: it being also probable, that the league continued as yet between these the successors of Beluchus and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deioctes to the first of Ahyages, there past above ninety years; in which, if Herodotus have written truly, that Phraortes conquered Persia, and how he and other Kings of Media by many Victories greatly enlarged their Dominions, and commanded many parts of Asia, it had been but an unadvised enterprize of the Assyrians and Babylonians, to have waded themselves against the Syrians and Egyptians, leaving to able and victorious a Nation on their backs. But that the Medes had done nothing upon the South parts of Persia; and that the Persians themselves were not Masters of Susiana in Nabuchodonosor's time; it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Governour for the Babylonian in Susa, or Susan, the chief City thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either under Cyaxares, or Ahyages, or both, had quarrel with Halyattes the Father of Croesus, which after some few years dispute was compounded.

How the affairs of Persia stood in so many ages, I do not find any memory. It seemeth that the roughness of the mountainous Country which they then posselt, with the confederacy which they continued with the Medes, gave them more security than fame: For it their Kings, being the posterity of Achaemenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatness which they afterwards obtained, would not have suffered any forgetfulness thereof. But as we find all Xenophon's reports, both of their Wars, and the state of those Countries, to be very convenient and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors; so it appears, that the race of Achaemenes held the Principality of Persia from Father to Son for many descents. And therefore we may better give credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyses the Father of Cyrus, was King of Persia; than to that that made him a mean man, and say, that Ahyages gave him his Daughter Mandane in Marriage, to the end that her Son (whose nativity he feared) might be disabled from any great undertaking by his Fathers ignobility.

For what cause of grief could it be to Ahyages, that the Son of his Daughter should become Lord of the best part of Asia? No, it was more likely, that upon such a Prophecy his love to his Grand-child should have increased, and his care to see the greater to have married her to some Prince of strength and eminent virtue.

Yea, the same Herodotus, who is the first Author, and as I think, the deviler of the mischief intended against Cyrus by his Grand-father, doth confess, That the line of the Achaemenides was so renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his prosperity, did thence derive himself, and vaunt of it: which he would never have done, had they been ignoble, or that they been the vassals of any other King or Monarch.

For in this sort Xerxes in the seventh of Herodotus deriveth himself:

Achaemenes.	Tispenses.	Hystaspes.
Cambyses.	Arriaranes.	Darius.
Cyrus.	Aspases.	Xerxes.

Of the Achaemenides there were two races: of the first was Cyrus the great, whole issue-male failed in his two Sons, Cambyses and Smerdis. This royal Family is thus set down by the learned Reimscius.

Achaemenes, the Son of Perfes, first King of Persia. Darius, the first of that name, had Cambyses, and Aeschys, who married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, both Artisfana and other Daughters.

Cambyses had Cyrus the Great: Cyrus had Cambyses, who succeeded him, and Smerdis, slain by his Brother Cambyses.

Of the second, were those seven great Princes of Persia, who having overthrown the usurped Royalty of the Magi, chose from among themselves Darius the Son of Hystaspes, King.

This Kingdom of Persia was first known by the name of Elam, so called after Elam the Son of Soma, and the people therein inhabiting, Elamites; by Elymus, Elyma; by Josephus, Elyma. Suidas derives this Nation sometimes from Assur, sometimes from Magos, of whom they were called Magusae; which Magusae, according to Eusebius, Eccl. lib. 1. c. 1. v. 1. are not to be taken for the Nation in general, but for those that were afterward called the Magi, or Magicians.

Wise men. So do the Greeks, among many other their sayings of them, affirm, that the Persians were anciently written Elam, and that they called themselves Ophians. But that they were Elamites, Fff

CHAP. III. OF CYRUS.

SECT. I.

Of Cyrus his Name, and first Actions.

Strabo faith, That the same was taken from a River which watereth Persia, this great Prince having Agradas for his proper Name: But the great Cyrus was the first of that Name. Herodotus, otherwise; and that Cyrus signifieth a Father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore to intituled by the people.

It is true, that for his Justice and other excellent virtues, he was indeed called a Father: But that the Name of Cyrus had any such signification, I think it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to say as the Sun, in the same Language. Howsoever it be, yet the Prophet Isaiah, almost two hundred years before Cyrus was born, gives him that Name, Thus saith the Lord unto Cyrus his Anointed, &c.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the Victories which Cyrus obtained, were many and great: among which the Conquest of Lydia, and other Provinces thereto subject, together with the taking of Craesus himself, are not recounted by Eusebius, Orosius, and others, but placed among his latter achievements: whose opinion for his difference of time is founded upon two reasons; namely, That of the Medians there is no mention in the last War against Craesus; and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eighth and fiftieth Olympiad; and the glorious Victory which Cyrus had over Babylon, to the five and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might have been used (and was by the Greeks) to exclude the Alteas from the honour of having won Babylon it self, which in due place I have answered. The latter seems to have reference to the second War which Cyrus made upon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he so established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations never offered to revolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to believe with Herodotus, whom the most of Chronologers follow, and find the enterprise of Sardis to precede that of Babylon.

SECT. II.

Of Craesus the King of Lydia, who made War upon Cyrus.

I Have in the last Book spoke somewhat of Craesus, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which governed Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors known) was Lydius the Son of Ays: which Family extinguished, the Kingdom was by an Oracle conferred upon Agas, descended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twenty Generations, Candaules being the last, who by slaying his fair Wife naked to Gyges his Favourite, he was by the same Gyges (thereto urged upon peril of his own life by the Queen) the next day slain. Which done, Gyges enjoyed both the Queen and the Kingdom of Lydia, and left the same to Ays his Son, who was Father to Sadyattes, the Father of Halyattes (who thrust the Cimmerians out of Asia) and Halyattes begat Craesus. Which five Kings of a third race, enjoyed that Kingdom an hundred and seventy years. Halyattes the Father of Craesus was an undertaking Prince; and after he had continued a War against Cyaxares the Medians, a Prince very powerful, and maintained it six years, a peace was concluded upon equal conditions between them.

Astyages the Son of Cyaxares, and Grandfather to Cyrus, thought himself greatly honoured by obtaining Argentea, Craesus Sister, whom he married.

But Craesus so far enlarged his Dominions after his Fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territory to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were four in effect of equal strength; to wit, the Medians, the Babylonians, the Egyptians, and the Lydians: only Nabuchodonosor, after he had joined Phoenicia, Palaestina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thenceforward no Competitor during his own life.

But Craesus, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrel of the Babylonians, he yet mastered Adulis, Doris, and Ionis, Provinces possit by the Greeks in Asia the less, adjoining to Lydia; gave Law to the Phrygians, Bithynians, Carians, Carians, Asians, Phalagionians, and other Nations. And that he also forc'd the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding their compass'd their City with Diana's Girdle, Herodotus witnesseth. Moreover, Athenus out of Berosus (which also confirmeth) makes report of a signal Victory which Craesus obtained against the Sacaans, a Nation of the Scythians, in memory whereof the Babylonians his allies did yearly celebrate a Feast, which they call'd Sacaia: All which he performed in fourteen years.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and envious of Cyrus fame, doubting also that his prosperous undertakings might in the end grow perilous to himself, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo (whom he presented with marvellous rich gifts) what success he might hope for against Cyrus, if he undertook him: from whom he received this riddle; Craesus passing over the River Halys, shall dissolve a great Dominion. For the Devil being doubtful of the success, payed him with merchandise of both sides alike, and might be inverted either way, to the ruin of Persia, or of his own Lydia.

SECT. III.

Craesus his Expedition against Cyrus.

Hereupon Craesus being resolved to stop the all course of Cyrus fortunes, if he could: despised all the arguments used by Sandanes to the contrary: who desired him to fore-think, That he contrary a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region; a people not covered with the soft silk of Worms, but with the hard skins of Beasts; not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of Water, not of Wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; over whom, if he became victorious, he could thereby enrich himself in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled: and if by them beaten, and subjected, so great would his loss appear of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceived.

Notwithstanding this solid counsel, Craesus having prepared a powerful Army, he led the same toward Media: but in his passage he was arrested at Pterium, a City of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he fought by all means to surprize or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamp'd before it. That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I do not find: for out of doubt, Craesus, as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and ability; so was he not under any in territory and fame that then lived.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the gods, because they favoured a disturber and usurper of the Commonwealth against him who fought for the Roman liberty, That Kingdoms and Common-weals had their encrease and period from divine Ordinance: so at this time was the Winter of Craesus prosperity at hand, the leaves of his flourishing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had given a date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of divers skirmishes, the Persians and Lydians began to join in grois troops: supplies from both Kings thrust on upon the falling off, and advancement of either Nations: and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day; so when the dark-vail of night had hidden each Army from the others view, Craesus doubting what success the rising Sun would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speed possible retired; and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his first City and Regal Seat, without any pursuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arrived, and nothing suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other War for that Winter, he dismissed the Soldiers, and kept the Troops of his hungry Nations to their own Province, appointing them to re-assemble at the end of five months; acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of War at the time appointed.

SECT. IV.

The Conquest of Lydia by Cyrus.

Cyrus in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his Army in order to pursue them; yet not to hastily, and at their heels, as to be discovered. But having good intelligence of Craesus his proceeding, he so measured his marches, as he presented not himself before Sardis, till such time as Craesus had disposed his Army to their winning garisons; which being altogether unlooked for, and unfeared, he furnished Sardis with his Army; wherein Cyrus having no other Companies than his Citizens and Ordinary Guards, after fourteen days siege the same was taken by assault, and all executed: that resisted. Craesus having new out any pursuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arrived, and nothing suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other War for that Winter, he dismissed the Soldiers, and kept the Troops of his hungry Nations to their own Province, appointing them to re-assemble at the end of five months; acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of War at the time appointed.

Of which answer Cyrus being speedily informed, mortality, he commanded his Ministers of Justice to be summoned to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had persuaded him, or what self-reason had conducted him to invade his Territory, and to make him of a Friend an Enemy? To whom he thus answered: It was thy prosperous, and my unprosperous destiny (the Grecians call it) flattering therewithal my ambition) that were the inventors and conductors of Craesus War against me.

shall be broken through: whoever joineth himself, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their eyes, their houses spoiled, and their wives ravished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victory of Cyrus, or that received the report from others truly as it was, that could better leave the fame to posterity after it happened, than Isaiah hath done in many places of his Prophecies, which were written two hundred years before any thing attempted.

The greatness and magnificence of Babylon, were not by divers grave Authors set down, might seem altogether fabulous: for besides the reports of St. Hieron, Solinus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politics, the second Chapter, received the report for true, That one part of the City knew not that the rest was taken three days after. This is not impossible, if the testimony of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who finds the compass thereof at three hundred and threecore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes five and forty miles: the walls whereof do to great a breadth, that six Chariots might pass in front thereof. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitarchus, three hundred and threecore and fifty Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Book of Geography, gives it a greater circuit, adding five and twenty Furlongs more to the former compass, reckoning the same at three hundred fourcore and five Furlongs, which make eight and forty miles and one Furlong, but finds the wall far under that which Diodore reports: and to doth Cyrus measure their thickness but at two and thirty foot, and their height at an hundred cubits, which is also very much; every cubit containing a foot and a half of the large measure: though to the whole circuit of the City he gives the same with Siculus, and eight Furlongs more. Herodotus finds a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, four hundred and fourcore furlongs circle; the thickness of the wall he measures at fifty cubits, and the height at two hundred of the same regal cubit. For entrance, it had an hundred Gates of Brass, with Posts and Hooks to hang them on of the same metal: and therefore did the Prophet Isaiah rightly intitle Babylon, The Princes and Glory of Kingdoms.

But when Cyrus had won her, he stript her of her Princely Robes, and made her a slave; dividing not only all her goodly houses, and her whole Territory, with all the riches therein contained, among his Soldiers; but bestowing the inhabitants themselves as bond-slaves upon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the reign of Cyrus, and the time which he enjoyed in rest and pleasure, I can say no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers, to have lasted only seven years: in which time he made five such Constitutions as differ little from the Ordinances of all wise Kings that are desirous to establish a Royal power to themselves and their posterity.

SECT. VI.

The End of Cyrus.

THE last War, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diversly written. Herodotus and Justin deliver, That after the Conquest of Asia the less, Cyrus invaded the Massageti, a very warlike

Nation of the Scythians, governed by Tomyris their Queen; and that in an encounter between the Perians and these Northern Nomades, Tomyris lost her Army, and her Son Spartapetes that commanded it: In revenge whereof, this Queen making new levies of men of War, and following the War against Cyrus, in a second battle beat the Perian Army, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his body, and cast the same into a bowl of blood, using these words; Thou that hast all thy life time thirsted for blood, now drink thy fill, and satiate thy self.

It should hereby seem, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was persuaded to abate their fury by some forcible invasion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyaxares Father to Alyages, those Scythians invaded Media and Asia the less, and held the same in a servile subjection eight and twenty years.

This War which Metasthenes calleth Tomyrisque, lasted (saith he) six years, and took end at the end of Cyrus.

But in this particular I believe with Vigintius, that this Scythian War was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the conquest of Lydia, according to Ctesias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Spartilis; though he deliver the success of that War otherwise than Herodotus doth. The rather (saith Vigintius, because Strabo in his cleventh Book reciteth, that Cyrus surprized the Sacians by the same stratagem, by which Justin saith, he defeated the Son of Tomyris. And the same Ctesias also reporteth, That the last War which Cyrus made, was against Amorbeus King of the Derbecians, a Nation (as the rest) of Scythia; whom though he overcame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he suffered three days after.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his own City of Pasagardet, which himself had built, and where his Epitaph was to be read in his time; which is said to have been this: O vir, quicunque es, & indicande adventis, neque enim te adveniam ignoravi: Ego sum Cyrus qui Persis imperium constitui, posui hoc terra quo meum regitur corpus mihi ne invideat; O thou man, whosoever thou art, or whencesoever thou comest, for I was not ignorant that thou shouldst come: I am Cyrus that founded the Persian Empire: do not envy unto me this little earth, with which my body is covered.

This Tomb was opened by Alexander, as Quintus Curtius reporteth, either upon hope of treasure, supposed to have been buried with him, (or upon desire to honour his dead body with certain Ceremonies) in which there was found an old rotten Target, two Scythian Bows, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his body lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his own garment, and a Crown of Gold to be set upon it. These things well considered, as they give credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zanarus, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaves his body in the hands of Tomyris.

And surely had Cyrus lost the Army of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely that his Son would so soon have transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, so far off from that quarter; the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media: neither had Cambyses been able in such haste to have undertaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather believe Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged, and in peace: and that finding in himself, that he could not long enjoy the world, he called unto him his Nobility, with his two Sons, Cambyses and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tomyris avowed; and after a long Oration, wherein he assured himself, and taught others of the immortality of the Soul, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deserving of every man in this life; he exhorted his Sons by the strongest arguments he had, to a perpetual concord and agreement. Many other things he uttered, which make it probable, that he received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he governed Susa in Persia; and that Cyrus himself had read the Prophecy of Isaiah, wherein he was expressly named, and of God (as of delivering the Jews) preordained. Which act of delivering the holy Temple and City of Jerusalem, was in true consideration the noblest work that ever Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an instrument of Gods power, used for the chastising of many Nations, and the establishing of a Government in those parts of the world which was not long to continue. But herein he had the Grace to be an instrument of Gods goodness, and a willing advocate of his Kingdom upon Earth; which must last for ever, though heaven and earth shall perish.

SECT. VII.

Of Cyrus his Decree for building the Temple of God in Jerusalem.

HAVING therefore spoken of his great Victories, mentioned by fabled Historians, the glory of all which was a reward of this his service done unto him that was Author of them and of all good deeds; I hold it meet at length to speak of the Decree made in the first of his Reign, being perhaps the first that ever he made after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captive Jews should return again into their own Territory, and re-build the House of God in Jerusalem, having now endured and finished the threecore and ten years Captivity, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, he gave order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessary and wanting. He also restored unto them five thousand four hundred threecore and nine Vessels of Gold and Silver, wherewith Nabuchodonosor the Grandfather of Balthasar, had formerly robbed the Temple. The number of the Jews which returned out of Chaldea under their Leader Zorobabel, the Son of Salathiel, and Nephew to King Jecanias, and Jesuo or Josiah the Son of Josadac, were about fifty thousand; where, as soon as they arrived, they built an Altar to the living God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their own Law, and sacrificed thereunto themselves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

But no sooner did the Jews begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritans and other Idolatrous Nations adjoining, gave all the impediments they could. So did the Governors of those Provinces under Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort favoured the Jews, nor the labours nor purposes they had in hand. And not only those, which were but Provincial Lieutenants, and other officers of less place, but Cambyses himself; who having the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was busied otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that whatsoever Cambyses did when himself had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition: they may herein relieve themselves out of Ezra; That by the confusions of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus his life, &c. And therefore it is true, what the Jews themselves affirm, as it is written in the second of John, That the Temple was forty-six years in sitting up, having received 46 many hindrances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

And if we seek the natural and politic courses which moved Cambyses to withstand his Fathers Decree, and while he governed under him, as when himself became sole and Sovereign Monarch, we shall find them in that Epistle remembered by Ezra, written by Isidorus, Malvidantes, and the rest, Presidents and Counsellors in Phoenicia, wherein they complain that the Jews were evermore rebellious and troublers of Kings; that their City being once built, they would then refuse to pay tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Emperors, who had formerly done in the times of other Kings. But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment was, that Cambyses having in his resolution to invade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Jews were defended of those Nations, because they issued thence under Moses, when they conquered Judaas, their City being once repaired and fortified, they might return to their old vomit, and give the same disturbance to Cambyses Conquest, which they did to Sennacherib, Nabuchodonosor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in Ezekiel, Egypt was the confidence of the house of Israel.

But it is to be understood, as Codeman and others have observed, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counsellors and Governors of Phoenicia complained against the Jews, did not precede but succeed Darius Hystaspes, as in the sixth and seventh Chapters of Ezra it is made plain: and also that those Governors (whose Epistle hereunto is made) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and enclosing of the City, as by the reasons given in the said Epistle, and by the Kings answer, it is evident.

Also in the sixth of Ezra, the fourteenth verse, the Kings are named in order as they governed, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as, And they built and finished it (to wit, the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Israel, and by the commandment of Cyrus and Darius, and Artabshafte Kings of Persia. Lastly, in the seventh of Ezra it is written, Now after these things, in the reign of Artabshafte King of Persia: which was as much as to say, after the finishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of Ezra is there named by anticipation, not in his own time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the City and Temple of Jerusalem. Which action, though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pursued by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other Ordinances of Cyrus, with his turn and manner of Government are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire unto his eldest son Cambyses, appointing Smerdis or Tenaxares his younger son to be Satrapes, or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadusia; and then died, after he had reigned (saith Herodotus) one and thirty years, or (according to Justin) but thirty.

SECT. VIII.

Of Cyrus his Issue: and whether Atossa were his Daughter, or (as some think) were the same with Queen Hester.

Cyrus had issue two sons, Cambyfes and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroe, and Arystoma: Ctesius addeth to these, Amytis, Atossa, and Meroe their brother Cambyfes married; Arystoma, Darius Hyaspes obtained; so did he Atossa, Cambyfes being dead: who (as some Writers have supposed) inflamed both her Husbands, Darius and Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to be avenged of the whole Nation for the cruel intent that Atossa (whom the old Translation calleth a Macedonian) had against the Jews: though the opinion of Josephus be more probable, who finds Atossa to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be understood, how Atossa the daughter of Cyrus should have been Ephber, whose History seems rather to appertain to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the son of Hyaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to have Greece brought under the yoke of Persia, was partly grounded upon the honour which thereby the thought her Husband might obtain, partly upon a feminine humour of getting many brave Dames, Corinthians, Abenians, and others of that Nation, to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot give assent to the opinion of Codoman, who upon the near found of the two names, Atossa and Hadassia, (by the latter of which Ephber was also called) makes them to have been one person. For though it be true that Ephber concerning her Parentage, a while might be taken for a great Lady; yet Codoman's inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare unto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certain it is, that Ephber did at length discover her Kindred and Nation; whereby, if Histories could be kept free from this error, yet the people, and especially the Nobility, must needs have understood the truth: who nevertheless did to well know the Parentage of Atossa, that for her sake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her son Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdom before his elder brother, against whom also he could have pretended a very weak claim. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

CHAP. IV.

The Estate of things from the Death of Cyrus to the Reign of Darius.

SECT. I.

Of the Number and Names of the Persian Kings.

OF the Successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions. As that of Metasthenes, who hath numbered the Persian Kings, and their times as followeth.

Darius Medus, and Cyrus jointly	21
Cyrus alone	22
Priscus Artaxerxes	20
Darius Longimanus	37
Darius Nothus	19
Artaxerxes Mnemon	55
Artaxerxes Ochus	26
Arjes, or Arjanes	4
Darius, the last, conquered by Alexander	6

To which Phila agreeth; which number of years added, make in all an hundred ninety and one. But in this Catalogue Metasthenes hath left out Cambyfes and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Assuerus, for the immediate successor of Cyrus; in place (saith Melanithon) of Darius the Son of Hyaspes: for Metasthenes, as Melanithon conjectureth, doth not account Cambyfes in the Catalogue, because his reign was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a second Opinion, though ridiculous, of Sedor Olom, who finds but four Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire. Genslerard, Schwert, and Beroaldus, have also a differing account from the Greeks; whom nevertheless Eusebius, and most of the Latins follow, and so doth Krentschin, who hath fully answered, ^{Chro. Rom. fol. 139.} and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors, varying from that account. For in this sort do the Greeks marshal the Persian Kings with the times of their reigns.

Cyrus in all	30	Melanithon gives Cyrus but 25.
Cambyfes with the Magi	8
Darius Hyaspes	36
Xerxes	21	Metasth. but 20.
Artaxerxes Longimanus	40
Darius Nothus	19
Artaxerxes Mnemon	43	Metasth. but 40.
Artaxerxes Ochus	23	Melanith. 26.
Arjanes	3	Melanith. 4.
Darius, the last	6

Which numbers put together, make in all two hundred and thirty.

This account (as I have said) the most Chronologers, and the best learned approve. These Persian Princes, being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Pencer in his Historical Animadversions hath gathered the places; finding first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles, ch. 36. vers. 22, 23. Ezra 1. ch. 1. vers. 1. and often elsewhere.

Secondly, Cambyfes in the eleventh of Daniel, who may indeed be well esteemed for one of those three Kings in the second verse named, and so the

Chap. IV.

of the History of the World.

Marginal Commentator upon the Genesis, understandeth that place; but under correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he saith in the same note, that Darius Hyaspes was an enemy to the people of God, and stood against them: his great favour and liberality to the Jews being elsewhere proved.

Thirdly, Darius Hyaspes is found in Ezra the first, c. 4. v. 5. who in the sixth verse is also named Assuerus.

Fourthly, In the eleventh of Daniel, verse the second, Xerxes is plainly foretold and described, and the great War which he should make against the Greeks, by Daniel remembered.

Fifthly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verse seven, who is also called Artaxasapha, c. 4. v. 1. Ezra v. 7. and chap. 7. v. 7.

Sixthly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. v. 24. and cap. 5. v. 6. Nehem. cap. 12. v. 22.

Seventhly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem. cap. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arjanes: for Darius the last, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Xerxes the son of Atossa, Cyrus his Daughter; and the issue male of Cyrus falling with his own Sons.

But to proceed, Eusebius with the Latins following the Greeks, apply the beginnings and ends of every Persian King, with their Acts, to some certain Olympiad; As the War of Alyattes (Cyrus his maternal Grandfather) and Alyattes (Cyrus his Father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus reign, to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The Invasion of Egypt by Cambyfes to the third year of the three-score and third Olympiad, and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement between several forms of computation, add the more credit unto both.

Again, this Historical demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomical computation of Ptolemy, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the twelfth of November, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the four hundred and four and twentieth year after Nabonassar. And the Ara of Nabonassar began on the fix and twentieth of February: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth month of the first year of the eighth Olympiad: So that whether we follow the accounts of the Olympiads, as do the Greeks, Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolemy, we shall find every memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

For Ptolemy reckons the time answerable to two hundred and four and twenty Julian years, and an hundred and forty days from Nabonassar to the sixteenth of July, in the seventh year of Cambyfes.

The Greeks, and namely, Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyfes in the second or third year of the three-score and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyfes seventh year, in the first of the three-score and fourth Olympiad, which first of the three-score and fourth Olympiad, runs a long with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewise the twentieth of Darius, who succeeded Cambyfes, is according to Ptolemy, the two hundred and fix and fortieth of Nabonassar, which (observing the differences of Nabonassars Ara and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twenty years) agrees with the third of the three-score and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greeks. In this Josephus agrees with the Greek throughout, saving that he joineeth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus in the destruction of Babylon; which is true, and not contrary to the Greek computation, but may very well stand with it:

Lastly, The disagreement and confused accounts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearsed, doth give the greater credit to this of the Greeks, which being constant in it self, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

SECT. II.

Of Cambyfes, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

WE will therefore, according to the truth, give the Empire of Persia to Cambyfes, the Son of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, saving the desire to increase the greatness of his Empire; whereof he was possess in his Father's time, while Cyrus made War in the North. Ctesius with others give him a longer reign than agreeth with the Grecian account before received.

In the fifth year of his sole reign, and in the like. c. a. third year of the three-score and third Olympiad, according to Diodore and Eusebius, he invaded Egypt, and having overthrown the King thereof, Psammetichus, he not only caused him to be slain, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his Children.

Herodotus and Ctesius give for cause of this War (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyfes) that when he sent to Amasis King of Egypt, to have his Daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the Daughter of Apries his Predecessor, which Cambyfes dildained.

Howsoever it were, true it is, that Cambyfes gathered an Army fit for such an enterprize, and caused the same to march. But before they entered Egypt, Amasis died, and left Psammetichus, whom Ctesius called Amyrteus, his successor; who enjoyed Egypt after his Father (according to the best Copies of Herodotus) but six months, though other Chronologers give him six years.

But how long soever he held the Crown, in one battle he lost it, and was himself taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyfes following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered King, but that he also trusted him with the Government of Egypt; and that upon some revolt, or suspicion thereof, he caused him to be slaughtered. But the race of this King was not to be exterminated, if we may believe Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a Son called Inarus, who caused the Egyptians to revolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Psammetichus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyfes, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasis the King of Egypt, who died before his arrival, that he caused his body to be drawn out of the grave, and after divers indignities used, commanded the same to be burnt, contrary to the custom both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the Egyptians used to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugs, to the end the worms might not devour them. The Persians durst not consume them with fire, did it seem, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feed it with Carrion.

After this time of Syla Dictator, who caused his own to the Meroes, stating the Law called Talio, or like that of Pontif had unmov'd the carcass of Antioch, &c. Herodotus lib. 2. c. 107. & Justin lib. 8. p. 87, 88. Herodotus lib. 2. c. 107.

SECT. III.

The rest of Cambyfes his Affairs.

After this Victory obtained in Egypt, Cambyfes sent an Army into Cyprus, and constrained Eubolus King thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Island of the Egyptians.

While Cambyfes yet busied himself in Egypt, he so much detested the Idolatry of that Nation, as he caused the Images themselves, with the Temples wherein they were worshipp'd, to be torn down and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Army into Lybia, to overturn the Temple of Zepher Ammon; but the Devil in defence of his Oracle, raised such a Tempest of Sand, wherewith the greatest part of the Country is covered, as the Persians were therewith choked and over-wheled.

Notwithstanding which misadventure, Herodotus and Serces report, that disdaining to be resisted, he prepared the rest of his Army, which himself meant to conduct into those parts; but that finding a beginning of those inconveniences, which his first troops had tried, he changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings have power over men, yet the Elements do not obey them; according to that old English Proverb, God saith the King's Ways, saith the Tide.

After his return from the attempt of Abisipis, he caused Nas the Egyptian Bull, worshipp'd by that Nation as God, to be slain; a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeal, and been executed as in service of him that only is, and liveth. But soon afterwards, when in a dream it seem'd unto him that Smerdis did sit in the Royal Throne of Persia, (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gave it in charge to his Favorite: Praxaspes, to murder Smerdis his Brother. And having married his own Sisters, contrary to the Persian Laws, he committed a most heinous and most detestable murder upon the one of them called Meroe, then by himself with child, because she bewail'd the death of her Brother Smerdis. I find it written in this Cambyfes. That because his Predecessors observed religiously the Ordinances of their Empire, he assembled his Judges, and enquired of them, Whether there were any Law among the Persians that permit the Brother to marry his own Sister; it being his own interest so to do. The Judges (who had always either Laws or distinctions in store to fatisfie Kings and times) made answer, That there was not any thing written allowing any such conjunction; but they notwithstanding found it in their customs, that it was always left to the will of the Persian Kings to what best pleas'd themselves; and so as Nauclerus terms it, invenient occasion: that is as much to say, The Judges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselves. And yet where it concerned not the Kings private satisfaction, he caused Stannus one of his Judges, and perchance one of those which favoured his incestuous match, to be flayed alive, for an unjust judgment given, and the same his hide to be hung up over the judgment-seat. After which, bestowing the Fathers Office on his Son, he willed him to remember that the same partiality deferv'd the same punishment.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exercised against the Son of his beloved Praxaspes, was very strange and ungrateful. For when he desired to be truly inform'd by him what the Persians thought of his conditions? Praxaspes answered, That his virtues were followed with abundant praise from all men; only it was by many observed, That he took more than usual delight in the taste of Wine: with which taxation inflamed, he used this replication: And are the Persians double-tongued, who also tell me, that I have in all things excell'd my Father Cyrus? Thou Praxaspes shalt then witness, whether in this report they have done me right: for if at the first thou I pierce thy Sons heart with an Arrow, then is it false that hath been spoken; but if I miss the mark, I am then pleas'd that the fame be accounted true, and my subjects believed. This being spoken, he immediately directed an Arrow towards the innocent child, who falling down dead with the stroke, Cambyfes commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broached on the Arrow, this monstrous Tyrant greatly rejoicing, shew'd it to the Father, with this saying instead of an Epitaph: Non Praxaspes, thou mayest resolve thy self, that I have not lost my wits with wine, but the Persians themselves, who make false report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exercised, till at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became selon de Joy. For when he was inform'd, that Patizates and Smerdis the Magi (Cedrenus writeth them Sphendanis and Cimerius) Ministers of his Domestical affairs, taking advantage of the great resemblance between Smerdis the Kings Brother, and Smerdis the Magus, posselt themselves of the Empire, he made all haste towards Persia; and in mounting hastily on horse back, his sword disheating, pierced his own thigh, wherewith deadly wounded, falling into an over-late and remediless repentance of the slaughter which he had executed upon his own Brother, he soon after gave up his wicked ghost, when he had reigned eight years, accounting therein those seven months, in which the Magi governed while he was absent.

In Cambyfes the Male-line of Cyrus failed. For he had no issue either by Atossa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Herodotus gives him a Daughter called Zontene, Panrapetes, and a Son called Orontes: who being ¹¹⁷ drowned in the River Opheis by Antioch, the same was afterward in memory of the Princes death called Orontes.

He built the City of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Island of Nilus, calling it by the name of his Sister Meroe.

SECT. IV.

Of the Inter-regnum between Cambyfes and Darius.

Cyrus and his two Sons being now dead, and the Kingdom in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfeiter of Smerdis, the Princes, or Sarrapates, or Provincial Governours of the Empire, (to wit, Orontes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyas, Alpatines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achamenes the first Persian King) having discovered the fraud of this imposture, joined their forces together, surpriz'd and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions and Assistants. In which which action (Justin Fulsius) Intaphernes and Apharnes were slain: but Herodotus otherwise, that they were only wounded; for he avoweth, that all the seven Princes were present at the Election following.

For the Empire being now without a Governor, these Princes grew into a consultation how the same might be order'd from thence forth. Otaurus (one of the Seven) did not fancy any election of Kings; but that the Nobility and Cities should condescend, and by just Laws defend their Liberty in equality, giving divers reasons for his Opinion, being as it seem'd, greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyfes. As first, that it was not fit to give all power to any one, being greedy self, even in good men, doth often infect the mind with many vices, and that liberty and freedom in all things is most apt to insult, and to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Again, that Tyrants do commonly tie the service of wicked men, and favour them most; they usurp upon the Laws of their Country; take other mens wives by force, and destroy whom they please without judgment.

Megabyas was of another Opinion, affirming, that the tyranny of a multitude was thrice more intolerable than that of One. For the multitude do all things without judgment, run into business and affairs with precipitation, use raging and overbearing words.

He therefore thought it best to make election of a few, and those of the best, wisest, and most virtuous; because it is ever found, that excellent Counsels are ever had from excellent men.

CHAP. V.

Of Darius the Son of Hystaspes.

SECT. I.

Of Darius his Lineage.

Darius was defended of the ancient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achamenes, of which Cyrus the Great was the Lineal successor. For in this sort Herodotus delivers him as before;

Cyrus the first, who had

Telsinus, who begat

Artafernes, who was father of Arspames, the father of Hystaspes, the father of Darius, surnam'd Celes, the father of Xerxes.

Cur. l. 4.

Hystaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great in the Wars against the Scythians: at which time Cyrus being made jealous of Darius by a dream of his own, caus'd him to be sent into Persia; others say, to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was delivered, and made Governour of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyfes into Egypt; he then joined with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the neighing of his horse, or as others affirm, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he more

Darius gave the third judgment, who perswaded the creation of a King, because even among great ditinuity of concord is seldom found; and in great Empires it doth ever happen that the discord of many Rulers hath enforc'd the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, saith Darius, far later to observe the Laws of our Country, by which Kingly Government hath been ordain'd.

The other four Princes adher'd to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperial Government by God established and made prosperous. And to avoid partiality it was accorded, That the morning following, these seven Princes should mount on horse back, and on him the Kingdom should be conferr'd, whose Horse after the Sun-rising should first neigh, or bray. In the evening after this appointment was made, it is said, that Darius consulted with the Master of his Horse Oebarus, who in the Suburbs of the City, where the election was resolv'd, caus'd the same Horse whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to cover a Mare, who as soon as he came into the same place, was the first Horse that brayed. Whereupon the other six Princes descended from their Horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Plato in the third of his Laws affirmeth, that in memory of the seven Princes, wherof Darius himself was one, that delivered the Empire from the usurpation of the Magi, he divided the whole into seven Governments; Herodotus saith, into twenty Satrapies.

assured to himself by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Neices for his wives.

Hystaspes, according to * Herodotus, had besides * Herodotus these three Sons, who were great Commanders in the War which Darius made in Asia the less, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece; Atarnes, Artaphernes, and Artabanus, who disswaded Xerxes & 202. from the second Gracian War. Hystaspes had also a Daughter married to Gobrias the Father of Marius, Herodotus who commanded the Army of Darius in 180. Macedon, and married the Daughter of Darius, Arspates his Cousin-german.

Reinuccio gives to Hystaspes five Sons, Darius, who succeeded Cambyfes, Artabanus, Artaphernes, Orontes, and Atarnes, with two Daughters.

SECT. II.

Of Darius his Government, and suppressing the Rebellion of Babylon.

Darius devised equal Laws wherby his Subjects might be governed, the same being formerly promisd by Cyrus. He gave access to all his Subjects, and behaved himself so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassals: Only he laid divers payments and taxes on the people, which had not been accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of fourteen thousand five hundred and threecore talents, saith Herodotus.

The War which Cambyses made afar off in Egypt, and the contention between the Magi and the Princes of Persia for the Empire, gave heart to the Babylonians to recover their liberty, and to shake off the Persian yoke; whereof Darius being advertised, he prepared an Army to recover that City and State revolted. But finding the same a difficult work, he used the service of Zopyrus, who for the love he bare Darius, did cut off his own Ears and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to fly to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who for having given him advice to give over the siege of their City, had in this sort dismembered and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gave him that credit, as they trusted him with the disposition and commandment of their greatest forces: which when Zopyrus had obtained, after some small colourable overthrows given to the Persians upon sallies, he delivered the City into Darius's hands, who had lyen before it twenty months.

SECT. III.

Of Darius his favour to the Jews in building the Temple.

IN the second year of Darius, he gave order that the building of the Temple at Hierusalem should go on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his own charge, and out of the revenues of the Crown. And whereas the Governours of those Provinces which are situate between Euphrates and the Phanician, and midland Sea (whom Exra calleth the Captains beyond the River) had hindered the work in Cambyses his time, Darius gave commandment that they should not thenceforth come near unto Jerusalem, to give any impediment to the building, but that they should withdraw themselves, and get them far off till all were finished, and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab illis; Withdraw your selves far from them; In our English, Be ye far from thence, to wit, from the City and Temple now in building.

He also made a Decree which concerned his own Subjects, That whosoever should thenceforth hinder the setting up of the Temple of God, that his house should be torn down, and the disburthened on the Gallows made of the timber thereof. He also in the same Decree maketh invocation to God, That hath caused his Name to dwell there (to destroy all Kings and people that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Jerusalem, &c. In four years after which Decree the Jews being really furnished with money, and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth year of Darius Hystaspes; and in the two and fortieth after their first return.

AFTER the recovery of Babylon, he invaded the Scythians; whose King Jusfin calleth Lau. Darius undertook this War against him, because he refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to convey his Army into Scythia, he built a bridge of small Vessels over the River Ister or Danubius, and gave the custody of the same in charge (among others of Asia the Isles) to the Ionians and Æolians, among whom was Mitridates, who persuaded the Asian Grecians to bestride down the bridge, to the end Asian might not return thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficulty; but the same was resisted by Hystaspes Prince of Milet, a City of Ionis, which Darius gave a Colony of the Greeks; Diodorus call. Bidd. Lat. Eth Traytors to their Country, because they joined themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaves, for as much as they would not run away from their Master, but were more mindful of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as fair an occasion of liberty as could have been desired. For the great Army of Darius entering the desert Country called Belsarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any sustenance to relieve them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chim Tartars their posterity, at this day all horsemen, using the Bow and Sword. They were not Ploughmen, but Grangers, driving their Herds from one place to another, as opportunity of Pasture led them. Standing Towns they had none, but used for Houses the Waggon wherein they carried their Wives and Children. Their Waggon they place at every Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Town, removable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperor himself, called now the great Chim, any other City than such as Agora (as they name it) or Town of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himself, and waited his Provision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither ways to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitful trees, or living creatures, nor any things at all, which either he himself might make use of, or by destroying it might grieve his enemies; he began to perceive his own folly, and the danger into which it had brought him. Yet setting a good face upon a bad game, he sent brave messengers to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make trial of his valour and fortune in plain battel: Or, if he acknowledged himself the weaker, then to yield by fair means, and become his Subject; giving him Earth and Water, which the Persians used to demand as a sign that all was yielded unto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hyperbolyical answer; lending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and five Arrows: which dumb shew Darius interpreting by his own will, thought that he did yield all the Elements wherein those creatures live, and his weapons withal into his hands. But Gobryas one of the seven Princes, who had slain the Magi, construed their meaning aright, which was thus; O ye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, or dive under the water, or creep into holes in the earth, for else ye shall not escape our arrows. And this interpretation was soon verified by the Scythians themselves, who assailed the Persian Camp, drove the Horsemen into the Trenches, and vexed the Army

Army with continual Allarums day and night; were so fearfuls of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and even in his sight, they did not forbear the pastime of coursing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldness of theirs, Darius was so discouraged, that he forsook his Camp by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were sick and weak behind him, and to with all speed marched away towards the River Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians, who mist him; yet arriving at the Bridge before him, persuaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Persian King should never more be able to do them either good or harm. Which words had certainly been proved true, had not Hystaspes the Milesian prevailed with his people to attend the coming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise fail to meet, when they returned from Ister to seek him out.

SECT. V.

Some actions of the Persians in Europe, after the Scythian War.

Darius having thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the Invasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which War he employed Megabastus, who maltreated the Paonians, and transplanted them, and posset Perinthus, Chalcedon, Byzantium, and other places being also soon after subdued, and added to the Persian Empire by Othanes, the son of Sisyambus, whom Cambyses had excommunicated for false judgment. So were the Cities of * Selyria, and * Cardia likewise taken in from the Persian, who having now reduced under his obedience the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadors to Amintas King of Macedon adjoining, demanding of him by the Earth and Water the Sovereignty over that Kingdom. Amintas doubting his own strength, entertained the Embassadors with gentle words, and afterwards invited them to a solemn and magnificent feast; the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: which being granted, the Embassadors who were well filled with Wine, and premeditated upon their greatness, and many Victories, began to use such embracings, and other lascivious behaviour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings son, great Grandfather to Alexander the Great, disdainful the Persians barbarous presumption, rebellowed his Father to withdraw himself from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadors, whom withal he entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while; promising them their speedy return. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-favoured young men to clothe themselves in the same garments, and to use the same attires which the Ladies had worn at the feast, giving them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpire them with their long knives, of which they were provided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soon after given by Darius for a severe revenge of this murder: But Alexander somewhat before the death of Amintas gave his sister Oxyas in marriage to Babarius, a principal Commander of Darius's forces on that side, who persuading her Husband how helpful the Alliance of Macedon would prove for the Invasion of Asia intended, so prevailed, as Alexander escaped that tempest, which threatened to fall upon him very suddenly; the War of Asia the Isles, called Jonick, falling out at the same time.

SECT. VI.

The first occasion of the War which Darius made upon Greece, with a rehearsal of the Government in Athens, whence the quarrel grew.

NOW the better to understand the reason and motives of that great War, which followed soon after between the Persians and Grecians, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which City endured the hardest and worst brunt of Athens invasion on that side the Sea, with admirable success. Neither do I hold it any impertinency to be large in unfolding every circumstance of so great a business as gave fire to those Wars, which never could be thoroughly quenched, until in the ruin of this great Persian Monarchy. Persepolis the Capital City of the Empire, was at the request of an Athensian Harlot consumed with a flame as dreadful as in the pride of their greatness the Persians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore, as out of the former books it may be gathered, how Athens and other parts of Greece were anciently governed, the same being already set down, though scattering, and in several times, among other the Contemporary occurrences of the Eastern Emperors, and the Kings of India; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember again the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedemonians, they maintained still their ancient Policy under Kings, though these also after some fifteen descents were bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athensians, in the former books remembered, who willingly died for the safety of his people, was therefore to be honoured by them, as (thinking none worthy to succeed him) they changed their former Government from Monarchical, to Princes for term of life, of which Medon the Son of Codrus was the first; and of these there were twelve Generations besides Medon, to wit, Aegleus.

Solon, and others, who are the less to be regarded by reason of the yearly change.

This Solon being a man of excellent wisdom, gave Laws to the Athenians, which were published, according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth year of Tarquinus Priscus, and were in after-times derived unto the Romans, and by the Decemviri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into Twelve Tables, which were the ground of the Roman Laws. But these goodly ordinances of Solon were in his own days violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed unto the practice and maintenance of a popular Government; the State of Athena was very soon changed into a Monarchy by Pisistratus the son of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens divided into two factions, whereof Megacles and Lycurgus, two Citizens of Noble Families, were become the heads, took occasion by their contentions and infidelity to raise a third faction more powerful than the other two, and more plausible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in general. Having by this means obtained love and credit, he wounded himself, and fained that by malice of his enemies he had like to have been slain for his love to the good Citizens; he procured a Guard for his defence, and with that band of men surmounting the State-house, or Citadell of Athena, he made himself Lord of the Town, Hegemon being then Governor. But the Citizens who in every change of Government had sought to remove themselves further and further from the form of a Monarchy, could so ill brook this usurpation of Pisistratus, that he was driven for lack of help to fly the Town, as soon as Megacles and Lycurgus (joining their forces) attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his Tyranny, founded upon the dissention of the Citizens, was runned by their good agreement; so was it soon after well re-edified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of intention perceived no other remedy for his affairs, than to withdraw himself to Eretria, where he remained eleven years. Which time being expired, having hired Soldiers out of many parts of Greece, he again recovered the Principality of Athena: after which third obtaining his estate, he governed Athena seventeen years, according to Aristotle, and reigned in all thirty and three years, fifth Ellianus, but as Tufin hath it, and others accounting the time back as well before, as after the several expulsions, Hierodotus gives the Period of the Sonfix and thirty years; Aristotle of one and thirty. But Thucydides affirmeth, that he died very old, leaving for his Successors his two Sons, Hippias and Hipparchus, who governed the Athenians with such moderation, as they rather seemed the next successors of a natural Prince, than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and some three years before Hippias was expelled out of Athena, his Brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucydides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus was charged with unnatural lust after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogues, intitled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that he was a Prince of as many eminent virtues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers and authors of that scandal. Hippias fearing that this enterprize upon his Brother had more and deeper roots than were apparent, first sought to discover the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lennia: who because she would not reveal her Companions, did cut out her own tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himself, enter into a trait amity with Acanides, Tyrant of the City Lampfacus, Lyfion whom he knew to be greatly favoured by Darius, a City to whose Son Hyficles he gave one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three years after the death of his Brother, doubting I know not what the strong practice against himself, he began to use the Citizens with great severity, which neither Pisistratus the Father, nor Hippias himself had ever exercised during their usurpation till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this dislike might rather increafe than diminish in Hippias, they stirred up Clisthenes, one of the noblest and best able of their City, to practise their delivery: who, calling to his assistance the banished Alcmaeonides, together with an Army of the Lacedaemonians led by Cleomenes their King, so affrighted Hippias, as by his composition he gave over his estate, and the possession of Athena, and from thence imbarking himself, took Land at Sigean, whence he went to Sigean, a Lycurgus in Myfia governed by Acanides, who presented him to Darius. He was deprived of history of years before the battel of Marathon: all which time he continued partly with Acanides, at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Lydia; perfwading and practising the enterprize upon Athena, which Darius in the end to his great dishonour undertook, twenty years after Hippias had resigned his estate. Thus far I have digressed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceive the better the causes and motives of this War: whereof the hope that Hippias had to be restored to Athena by the help of Darius, which made him solicit and perfwade the Perfians to conquer Greece, was one, but not the most urgent.

SECT.

SECT. VII.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principal cause of the Wars ensuing between Greece and Persia.

Another and a strong motive to this expedition, was the Ionick War, breaking out in Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greece into Asia, which occupied the greatest part of the Sea-coast, having enjoyed their liberty about 500 years, even from the Ionick migration to the time of Croesus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcel of his Dominions, were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditary Servants to the Crown of Perfia.

But as it is the custom of Nations half conquered (witness Ireland) to rebel again upon every advantage and opportunity: so did the Ionians, and other Greeks, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seek by all means possible to free themselves.

At this time they found such men ready to spur them into Rebellion, as had by the Perfians been given unto them for bribes to hold them in subjection. Every one of those Towns had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the Government of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Perfians, by whose only might they held the people in subjection. And this their dutiful affection they had well declared, when Darius, being in great extremity, they used all means to deliver him and his Army (that otherwise had been lost) out of the Sythyans hands. Of this great piece of service Hippias the Tyrant of Miletus expected the chief thanks, as having been chief Author of their expecting Darius; when the rest, either perfwaded by the Sythyans, or carried away with their own desires, were ready to have abandoned him. But it came so to pass, that Darius being more fearful of the harm that Hippias (being powerful and crafty) might do to him in the future, than mindful of the good which he had already received at his hand, found means to carry him along to Susa, where he detained him with all kind usage of a friend, yet kept such good efpial upon him, as an enemy, he could not hurt away. Hippias had subtilty enough to discover the Kings purpose, and ill agreed with his own desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one fair City, having a small Territory, than to fit and feast at the great Kings Table, and hear the Counsels by which a large Empire was managed; being himself an idle beholder, and enjoying with much restraint of liberty, none other pleasures than a private man might bestow upon himself.

Wherefore he bethought himself of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacifie which, if he might be sent, as one that had great experience and authority in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either satisfy the King with excuses, or deal as occasion shall require. Resolving upon this course, he sent very secret instructions to Aristagoras his Kinsman, whom he had left his Deputy at Miletus, advising him to stir up some Rebellion. These directions came reasonably to Aristagoras, who having failed in an enterprize upon the Isle of Naxos, through the false dealing of a Perfian his Associate, stood in fear of disgrace, if not of some further ill that might befall him, as one that had waited the Kings treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counsel: and the better to draw the whole Country of Ionio into the same course which he determined to run, he abandoned his tyranny, and did let Miletus at liberty. This plausible beginning won unto him the hearts of the Milefians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom first he took and sold as slaves to their Citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to be at his command. The Perfian Fleet, whereof he lately had been Admiral in the enterprize of Naxos, he had surprized in his first breaking out, together with the principal Officers and Captains: so that now he thought himself able to deal with the great Kings forces lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be upon his neck, and crush both him and his assistants to pieces, unless he were able to raise an Army that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were insufficient to perform. Therefore he took a journey to Sparta, where having stayed in vain with many arguments, and the offer of fifty Talents, to win to his party Cleomenes King of the Lacedaemonians; he went thence to Athena, and with better success, won the people to lend him their assistance. The Athenian Ambassadors which had been sent to the Perfian Kings Lieutenant in the lower Asia, desiring them not to give countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answers, having found very churlish entertainment. So that the evil which they were to expect in all likelihood from the Perfians, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their conglutination with the Ionians, and the perfwasions of Aristagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twenty ships the Athenians furnished for this Voyage; to which the Ertrians furnished five more, in regard of the ancient Kindred, that had passed between the Ionians and them. With these and their own forces joined, the Ionians entered the River Caifrus, which falleth into the Sea by Ephesus: by which advantage they surprized Sardis, when no enemy was heard of or suspected; infomuch as Artaphernes, who ruled as Viceroy in those parts, had no other hope of safety, than by retreating himself into the Castle, which the Greeks could not force: from whence he beheld the slaughter of the Citizens, and the City flaming.

The Perfians at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recovered the Market-place, strengthened by the River Pallus, which ran thorough it; and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselves, and charged their enemies; who well advising themselves, made all the haste they could toward the Sea-side. But Artaphernes having gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Greeks, and found them near Ephesus; where letting rest solely upon them, he slaughtered a great part of their Army, the rest saving themselves in Ephesus. In this fight, Eucledes, Captain of the Ertrians perished: but his fame and memory was by that excellent Poet Simonides preferred. After this overthrow, the Athenians which were before sent unto Aristagoras, and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their tears, be perfwaded to make any second trial of their fortunes on that side the Sea.

 Ertria is the usual practice of the weaker side call in the others call Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Father became very powerful; yet so, that Pisistratus by his power was made Master both of them, and all the rest. But this agreement held not long, and Ellian, the Alcmaeonides, and especially Megacles, being incensed against Pisistratus for his misdemeanor towards his Wife. Wherefore they practised with the Soldiers of the Town, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so far, that Pisistratus (upon the first discovery of their

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noise in the world, than the late good success which the Persians had in one or two skirmishes could raise. Wherefore the Ionians bravely proceeded, won a great part of Caria; and kindling their Fleet into the Hellepont, got Bisantium and other Towns into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians lately subdued by Cambyses, began hereupon to take heart; and entering into confederacy with the Ionians, who were able to give them aid by Sea, rebelled against the Persians.

These news coming to the ear of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, upon whom he vowed to take sharp revenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to think, that they would not have dared to attempt such things, but by the indignation of those to whom the ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to provoke him. This was the main ground of the War commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against Athen: To which the solicitation of Hippias, before remembered, gave only some form and assistance: the business when once it was thus far on foot, being like enough to have proceeded, though he had perished, ere it were advanced any further.

Some other occurrences in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrel of Darius against many of the Islanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greeks; for all of them gave to his Rebels free harbour: the Islanders moreover did help to furnish out a Navy of three hundred and sixty sail against him. These provocations did rather breed in him a desire to abate their pride, than any fear of harm that they were like to do him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surprize. In every fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline; whereas in Cyrene had trained them, nor all their ancient Captains. In one Sea-fight by the life of Cyrene, the Ionians indeed had the upper-hand; but they were Phœnicians, Egyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neither was that victory of any use to them; the Cyprians in whose aid they came, being utterly beaten by the Persian Army at Land, and reduced into their old subjection. So had the Persians likewise by open War and fair force overthrown the Carians in two battles, and reclaimed that Nation, as also Ionians had recovered the Towns upon Hellepont, with some Æolian and Ionian Cities, when Archagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to eat himself in Amphipolis, a Colony of the Athenians. But the Edonians on whose Territory he-like he landed, overthrew him, and cut his troops in pieces.

About the same time, Histiæus, the first mover of this insurrection, came down into those quarters; who having undertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whom his double-dealing was detected.

But this Evason preferred him not long. And after many vain attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, left the King (should pardon him upon remembrance of old good turns; as it seems that he would have done, by the Burial which he commanded to be given to his dead body that was crucified, and by his heavy taking of his death).

Histiæus had sought to put himself into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his conditions, chose rather to keep him out, and make shift for themselves without his help. The strength of their City by Land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings; and their good Fleet, which promised unto them the liberty of an open Sea, emboldened them to try the uttermost, when very few friends were left upon that Continent to take care. But their Navy was broken as much by threatenings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking them upon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the cruel flight of those that should have assisted them. Neither was it long before the Town itself, being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slain, their Wives and Children made slaves, and their goods a booty to the Persians, whom for six years space they had put to so much trouble.

SECT. VIII.

The War which Darius made upon Greece, with the battel of Marathon, and Darius his death.

THIS War with good success finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe by the side with variable success; Darius obdurate in the enterprise and conquest of Greece (though at first he pretended to make the War but against the Athenians and Eretrians, who jointly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his Ambassadors, demand an acknowledgment from them all: among whom, some of them not so well resolved as the rest, submitted themselves; as the Ægians, and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed, (by the assistance of the Lacedæmonians) after divers encounters forced them to give pledges, and to relinquish the party and name of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedæmonians in the cause of this War, and caused his companion King Demetrius to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, and by the more confident of victory, by reason of their discords, alienations, and civil Wars among the Greeks. He therefore gave order to Hipparchus to prepare a Fleet of Ships, fit to transport his Army over the Hellepont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. The charge in chief of his Army he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the son of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athen twenty years before, and by Artaphernes his Brother, Governor of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the left. Their Commanders having their Companies brought down to the Sea-side, embarked themselves in six hundred Gallies and other Vessels, and first of all attempted the Islands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way between Asia the left, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces over the Ægean Sea; but on the contrary they might always both relieve themselves in the passage, and shroud themselves from all sudden tempests and outrage.

To this end, they first possessed themselves of Samos; secondly, they attempted Naxos: which Island the Inhabitants despairing of their own force, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was native: which Island Darius did not only forbear to sack, but recalling the Inhabitants, he gave order to beautify the places and Altars of Sacris to Apollo erected. And having recovered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their court for Eretria in Eubœa: for that City (as already hath been shewed) had assisted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians took ground, and besieged Eretria very straitly, and after six days assault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Euphobus and Phidias, they took it, sacked it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus far the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sails. From Eubœa the Persians past their Army into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athen, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed towards Athen.

The Athenians finding the time arrived wherein they were to dispute with their own virtues against Fortune, and to cast lots for their liberty, for their wives, their children, and their lives, put themselves in the best order they could to make resistance, and withal sent away with speed to the Lacedæmonians for succour, employing in that Negotiation one Philippides; who passing through Arctia encountered in the way a familiar Devil, which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to assure the Athenians of victory, promising that some one of the gods should be present at the battel to assist them, and defend them by his power, against their enemies. Philippides at his return, seeing he could not bring with him any present succours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly availing to bring news from the gods, and promise of assistance from Heaven, which no doubt the device was somewhat likely to be his own, yet it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages have been more stirred up with fond Prophecies, and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any just cause or solid reason.

The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand only of the Plataians (who having been formerly dejected by the Athenians against the Thebans), and in this extremity witness their thankfulness and grateful disposition) began to dispute, Whether it were most for their advantage to defend the walls of Athen, or to put themselves into the field with such forces as they had, the same consisting of ten thousand Athenians, and one thousand of the Plataians? In the end, and after great diversity of opinions, Miltiades, who persuaded the trial by battel, prevailed.

The Armies being now in view, and within a mile of each other, the Athenians disposed themselves into three troops: two wings or horns, they term them; and the body of a battel. The Persians when they perceived to small a troop advancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather disposed off their understandings, than possessed with the resolution whereof they made show. So invincible and refulgent the Persians esteemed their own numbers to be, and that small troop of their enemies then in view, rather to be despised than to be fought withal: But in conclusion, the Victory (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his Father in valour, nor to Themistocles in understanding, but exceeded them both in Justice and good Government.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recover his honour, than sorrow for the loss received in Greece, gave order for new levies of men, and all other warlike provisions. But the Egyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdom of great strength and revenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the re-invasion of Greece. The diffention also among his Sons, of whom the younger being born after he was King, and by to great a mother and of the Grecians an hundred fourscore and twelve. For howsoever it came to pass, either by strange Visions, which were afterward called Panmixis, or by some other fright, it seemeth that the invading Army after the first encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and lost that number, by Heracles led down, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their but running away. As for Justinus report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian Army were slain, the same hath no appearance nor possibility of truth. In this fight Hippias the periklador of the enterprise was slain, saith Justin and Cicero; but Suidas tells us, That he escaped, and did most miserably in Lemnos.

The greatest honour of this Victory was cast upon Miltiades, who both perswaded the trial by battel, and behaved himself therein unwisely to the counsel which he gave. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first beard. Those of the Grecians of mark and commandment, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Sestius. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persians to their embarkment, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to have held it from putting off the shore, and having his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left, of which also being deprived, he took hold of it with his teeth. This Encounter happened in the first year of the threecore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the War made by Coriolanus against his fellow Romans: Alexander the Son of Amyntas being then King of Macedon, and Phamippus then Governor of Athen, according to Plutarch, or Hylbiades, after Halcarnassus.

This great fray thus past, and the Persians returned back into the lesser Asia, Miltiades sought and obtained an employment against the Islanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades; and passing over his Companies in threecore and ten Gallies, after six and twenty days assault he brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, where-with himself being made unable, and his Companies discouraged, he returned to Athen, where those ungrateful Citizens forgetting all his services past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battel of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xanthippus the father of Pericles (who envied his fame) cast him into prison, and let on him a fine of fifty Talents; where his weak and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few days ended his life.

Which envy of the better sort to each other, with their private Factions, assisted by the unthankful and wideless people, brought them not many years after, from a victorious and famous Nation, to base subjection and slavery. Miltiades left behind him one son called Cymon begotten on Hege-sipia, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his Father in valour, nor to Themistocles in understanding, but exceeded them both in Justice and good Government.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recover his honour, than sorrow for the loss received in Greece, gave order for new levies of men, and all other warlike provisions. But the Egyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdom of great strength and revenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the re-invasion of Greece. The diffention also among his Sons, of whom the younger being born after he was King, and by to great a mother as Atossa, disdaining to give place to his elder brother, ther, born before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, Death, who hath no respect of any mans affairs, gave end to all his consultations and enterprises, and joined him to the earth of his Ancestors, about a year after the bat-tel of Marathon, and after that he had reigned six and thirty years. He left behind him five sons, namely, Artabanes, born before he obtained the Kingdom, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achamenes Governour of Egypt, Masistes, and Artabignes.

CHAP. VI.

OF XERXES.

SECT. I.

The Preparations of Xerxes against Greece.

Xerxes received from his Father, as hereditary, a double War, one to be made against the Egyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Gracians, of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the success ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this War, which was chiefly bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Greece were divided in opinion. Mardonius who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, under Darius, and had also Hyllaspes for his Grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his Sister Artaxogires, persuaded by many arguments the European War. But Artabanes, Brother to the late Darius, and Uncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsel, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous success of the two late Invasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsel: The one in person upon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants upon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his Enemies both his Army and his Honour.

He therefore besought Xerxes to be right well advised before he did too far embark himself in this business. For whatsoever undertaking hath deliberate and sound counsel for conductor, though the success do not always answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variability of his own nature, which only the Divine Providence, and not any humane power, can contrain.

But to obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanes, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which he made known to all those that opposed his desire to this War (changing opinion and counsel) assisted the Gracian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the War of Egypt was ended, four years were consumed in despoiling and gathering an Army for this invasion: which being compounded of all Nations subject to the Persian Empire, consisted of seventeen hundred thousand foot, and eighty thousand Horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts of Carriage, if we may believe Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus finds the number less by seven hundred thousand footmen.

The Commanders of the several Nations were the Princes of the blood of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise; for to these were all commandments of this nature given, some few people excepted, who had of their own Leaders.

The charge of the whole Army was bestowed on Mardonius, the Son of Gobrias, by a sister of Darius, to whom were joined some others of Xerxes his nearest kindred, as Generals over all; saving that the charge of ten thousand select Persians, called the Immortal Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died, or were slain, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was given to Hydarnes; the eighty thousand horsemen were led by the sons of Darius, who commanded the late Army of Darius in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were 2200, and eight furnished by the Phoenicians, who had Commanders of their own Nation, and by the Cypriots, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Aeolians, and Hellepontines; who were trusted with the furnishing of their own Vessels, though commanded by the Princes of Persia, as by Artabignes the Son of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand.

There were also certain Gallies furnished by Artamesia, the daughter of Lygdamis, Princes of Halicarnassus, and the Islands adjoining, which he himself commanded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting those of Zidon, in which Xerxes himself was embarked.

SECT. II.

Xerxes Army entertained by Pythius: his cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his Bridg of Boats over the Hellespont: and the discourse between him and Artabanes upon the view of the Army.

When this World of an Army was thoroughly furnished, he caulked all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendezvous, and repair at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had assembled to the number of seventeen hundred thousand foot, as he entered the border of Celestina he was by one Pythius a Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Herds of Cattel gave food to Xerxes and his whole Army. The least ended, he also presented him with two thousand Talents of Silver, and in Gold four Millions, wanting seven thousand of the Persian Darius; which make so many of our Marks.

The King overcome with the exceeding liberality of Pythius, did not only refuse his treatise offered, but commanded that seven thousand Darius should be given him to make up his four Millions; of which to many thousands were wanting when he made the Present. But soon after, when Pythius brought him to spare one of his five sons from his attendance into Greece (because himself was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his own son), Xerxes most barbarously called the young man, for whom his father sought exemption, to be sundered into two parts, commanding that the one half of his Carcass should be layed on the right, and the other half on the left hand of the common way by which the Army marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-side: The one was a passage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athos, making the same (with the half Island or Headland whereon it stood) to be an entire Island; sundring therefrom the Continent of Thrace five Cities, besides the Mountain and the Chersonesus, or Neck of Land it self: a work of more ostentation than of use, and yet an enterprise of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent having but twelve furlongs (which make about a mile and a half) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough only for two Gallies to pass in front. The Cities to be severed from the main, were Dion, Olympus, Acrothion, Trojan, and Cleone.

He also gave order, that a Bridge upon Boats should be made over the Hellespont between Abidus and Sestos, the Sea there having a mile of breadth wanting an eighth part; which after the finishing, was by a Tempest torn asunder and disordered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commanded those to be slain that were masters of the work, and caused six hundred three-score and fourteen Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and industry of the Phoenicians, was so well anchored to resist both winds blowing into, and from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boarded and railed, the whole Army of seventeen hundred thousand Foot, and four-score thousand Horse, with all the Moyles and Carriages, past over it into Europe in seven days and seven nights, without intermission. This transportation of Armies did Cesar afterward use. And Caligula, that mad Emperor, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Army brought near to the Sea-side, Xerxes took a view of all his Troops, assembled in the Plains of Abidus, being carried up, and seated on a place over-topping the Land round about to many Nations, and so powerful an Army and Fleet, he suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into tears, moved with this contemplation, That in one hundred years there should not any one survive of that marvellous multitude: the cause of which sudden change of passion when he uttered to Artabanes his Uncle, Artabanes spake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troop within that number of years by the King remembered, is; That the life it self which we enjoy is yet more miserable than the end thereof: for in those few days given us in the world, there is no man among all these or elsewhere, that ever found himself so accompanied with happiness, but that he oftentimes pleased himself better with the desire and hope of death, than of living; the incident calamities, diseases, and sorrows whereto mankind is subject, being so many and inevitable; that the shortest life doth oftentimes appear unto us over-long, to avoid all which there is neither refuge nor rest, but in desired death alone.

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanes not to over-cast those joys which they had now in pursuit, with sad remembrances. And holding still a doubtful conceit, that Artabanes utterly condemned the invasion of Greece, against which he had formerly given many strong reasons, desired him to deal freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous; or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good success? Artabanes, notwithstanding that he assured himself of the Kings resolution to go on, and dared not by any new arguments to batter the great purpose it self, yet he told the King, That there were two things which marvellously affrighted him, and which the King should find, as he feared, to be most adverse, to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the World any Port capable of so great a Fleet; inasmuch, as if any tempest should arise, all the Continents of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Havens thereof afford them any safety: and therefore when any such shelter shall be wanting unto them, he prayed him to understand, that in such a case of extremity men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other inconveniences, will be found by so much the more an enemy, by how much the unsatiate desire of man to obtain more and more thereof, doth lead him forward: for were there no man found to give resistance, yet the want of means to feed such an Army, and the famine which cannot be prevented, will without any other violence offered, diminish and consume it.

By these Arguments Artabanes hoped to have diverted Xerxes, not daring perchance to utter what indeed he most feared, to wit, the overthrow of the Army it self both by Sea and Land, which soon after followed. These cautions were exceeding weighty, if Xerxes his obstinacy had not misperceived them. For to invade by Sea upon a perilous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succoured by any party, may better fit a Prince pre-occupied on his fortune, than enriched with understanding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second upon England in the year 1588, who had been like never heard of this Council of Artabanes to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point; It is very likely that Xerxes his Army, which could not have in it less than two millions of Souls, besides his beasts for service, and carriage, should after a few days suffer famine, and using Machiavels words, Mourir sans souffrir: Die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait, and mountainous Country, to yield food (besides what served themselves) for twenty hundred thousand strangers, whom they never meant to entertain but with the sharpest points of their Weapons, destroying withal whatsoever they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may believe Herodotus, the Army of Xerxes being reviewed at Thermopylae, consisted of five millions, two hundred eighty three thousand, two hundred twenty men, besides Landforces, Harlots, and Horles; and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to provide for all things; and that whoever should enterprize any great matter, if he gave the hearing to all that could be objected of accidental inconveniences, he should never pursue the fame farther than the dispute and constitation: which if his Predecessors, the Perſian Kings, had done, they had never grown to that greatness, or posselt so many Kingdoms and Nations as they now did; and therefore concluded, That great enterprizes were never undertaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessity had inford him to that War. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which he already commanded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerful prosperity of the Perſians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes his Dominions (of whose resolution his Father Darius had made a dear experience) the fruit of this War was answerable to the plantation, and the success and end agreeable to the weak council whereto it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his own judgment not sufficient (for he gathered in, marching on, all the strength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to fear the Greeks by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those uncountable multitudes: Non vires habent, sed pondus; & impenduntia potius sunt, quam auxilium: They are great in bulk, but weak in forces, and rather a baggage than an aid.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshall such a world of men in one Army; so the divers Nations, speaking divers languages, bred the same confusion among the Perſian Commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel when they came to work. Whereas if Xerxes had of his five millions compounded ten Armies of fifty thousand chosen Soldiers in each, and sent them yearly into Greece well victualled and furnished, he had either prevailed by the sword, or forced them to forsake their territory, brought them into obedience by necessity and famine, which cannot be resisted. But while Xerxes resolved to cut down the banks of Greece, and to let in a sea of men upon them, he was deceived both of his own hopes, and in their hearts whom he employed, and beaten by the Greeks both by Land and Sea; yea, he himself, conducted by his fear, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Army was buried in Thessaly, and led by Mardonius who periwaded the enterprize, was in the summer following utterly defeated, and himself slain.

SECT. III.

Of the fights at Thermopylae and Artemisium.

After such time as Xerxes had transported the Army over the Isthmus, and landed in Thrace (leaving the description of his passage along that Coast, and how the River of Lisus was drunk dry by his multitudes, and the Lake near to Plissym by his cattle, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece); I will speak of the encounters he had, and the shameful and incredible overthrows which he received. As first at Thermopylae, a narrow passage of half an acre of ground, lying between the Mountains which did divide Thessaly from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedaemonians, assisted with one thousand Tegeatae and Mantineans, one thousand Aradians, and other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole; besides one thousand Phocians, four hundred Thebans, seven hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole days together against that huge Army of the Perſians. The valour of the Greeks appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first dayes fight Xerxes is said to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Army by one handful of those men whom not long before he had utterly despised: and when the second days attempt upon the Greeks had proved vain, he was altogether ignorant how to proceed further; and so might have continued, had not a runaway Grecian caught him a secret way, by which part of his Army might assault the ledges of mountains, and set upon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Perſian Army had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greeks, then did Leonidas King of the Lacedaemonians, with his three hundred and seven hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good; and with admirable courage not only resist that world of men which charged them on all sides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slain upon the place. Xerxes having lost in this last fight, together with twenty thousand other Soldiers and Captains, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconvenience might befall him by the virtue of such a had not been present at these battles, with whom he knew that he shortly was to deal. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great fear, whose manhood had appeared singular in this trial, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring into the field. It is reported of Dionysius the Spartan, that when one thought to have terrified him by saying, That the flight of the Perſian Arrows was so thick as would hide the Sun; he answered thus: It is very good news, for then shall we fight in the cool shade.

Such notable resolution having as freely been expressed in deeds, as was uttered in words, caused the Perſians to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the City of Sparta could arm well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedaemonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked council of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had always well advised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces should be brought together to defend the Isthmus, that streight neck of ground which joineth Peloponnesus to the Continent. For which cause he advised, That three hundred ships well manned, should be sent

sent unto the Coast of Laconia, to spoil the Country, and to hold the Lacedaemonians and their neighbours busied at home, whilst Xerxes at his leisure having subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power upon them, who remaining destitute of succour, would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further advised, That the said Fleet of three hundred ships should seize upon the Island then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying near to the Coast of Laconia, might serve as a fit place of Rendezvous upon all occasions, either of their own defence, or endangering the enemy: whereby that ancient speech of Chilon the Lacedaemonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countrymen to have that Isle drowned in the Sea, than stand so inconveniently for them as it did. What effect this counsel might have taken, had it been followed, it is not easy to guess. But a contrary opinion of Achomenes brother to King Xerxes, was preferred as the safer. For the Perſian Fleet had been sore vexed with a grievous tempest, which continued three whole days together, wherein were lost upon the Coast of Magnesia four hundred ships of War, besides other Vessels innumerable, accordingly as Arabanus had foreseen, that if any such calamity should overtake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to give them succour. Therefore Achomenes periwaded his Brother not to disperse his Fleet; for if (said he) after the loss of four hundred ships we shall send away other three hundred to seek adventures, then will the Greeks be strong enough by Sea to encounter the rest of the Navy, which holding all together, is invincible. To this counsel Xerxes yielded, hoping that his Land Army and Fleet, should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilst both held one course, and lay not far asunder. But herein he was far deceived; for about the same time that his Army had felt the valour of the Greeks by Land, his Navy likewise made a sorrowful proof of their skill and courage at Sea. The Grecians Fleet lay at that time at Artemisium, in the Straits of Euboea, where the Perſians thinking to encompass them, sent two hundred sail about the Island to fall upon them behind, using a like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas, in a case so unlike, but with far different success. For that narrow channel of the Sea, which divideth Euboea from the main, was in the same sort held by a Navy of two hundred three score and eleven sail against the huge Perſian Armado, as the Straits of Thermopylae had formerly been maintained by Leonidas till he was circumvented, as this Navy might have been, but was not. The departure of those two hundred ships that were sent about the Island, and the cause of their voyage, was too well known in the Perſian Fleet, and soon enough disclosed to the Greeks, who setting sail by night, met them with a counter-prize, taking and sinking thirty Vessels, inforcing the rest to take the Sea; where being over taken with foul weather, they were driven upon the Rocks, and cast all away. Contrariwise, the Navy of the Greeks were increased by the arrival of fifty three Athenian ships, and one Lemnian, which came to their party in the last fight. As these new forces encouraged the one side, so the fear of Xerxes his displeasure stirred up the other to redeem their loss with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their unfortunate policy, they resolved in plain fight to repair their honour, and casting themselves into the form of a Crescent, thought so to inclose the Greeks, who readily did present them battle at Artemisium.

The fight endured from noon till night; and ended with equal loss to both parts. For though more of the Perſian ships were sunk and taken, yet the lesser loss fell altogether as heavy upon the Greekish Fleet, which being finally, could worse bear it. Herein only the Barbarians may seem to have had the worst; that they forsook the place of fight, leaving the wrack and spoils to the enemy, who nevertheless were fain to abandon presently even the passage which they had undertaken to defend; both for that many of their ships were sorely crushed in the battle; and especially because they had received advertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylae. Before they weighed Anchors, Themistocles General of the Athenians, engraved upon stone at the watering-place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they should revolt unto the Greeks, or stand neutral; which periwasion, he hoped, would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Perſians.

SECT. IV.

The attempt of Xerxes upon Apollo's Temple: and his taking of Athens.

When Xerxes had past the Straits of Thermopylae, he wasted the Country of the Phocians, and the regions adjoining: as for the Inhabitants, they chose rather to fly, and relieve themselves to a day of battle, than to adventure their lives into his hands, upon hope of saving their wealth, by making proffer unto him of their service. Part of his Army he sent to spoil the Temple of Delphi, which was exceeding rich by means of many Offerings that had been made by divers Kings, and great personages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inventory than of the goods left in his own Palace. To make relation of a great affrontment that fell upon the Companies which arrived at the Temple to have sacked it, and of two Rocks that breaking from the Mount Parassius, overwhelmed many of the Barbarians; is were peradventure somewhat superfluous. Yet Herodotus, who lived not long after, saith, That the broken Rocks remained even to his memory in the Temple of Athena, whither they rolled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing he believed that Apollo was a god, he should not have dared to entertain a covetous desire of enriching himself by committing sacrilege upon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licent to chastise his impiety, in such manner as is reported, was granted unto the Devil, by that Holy One, who saith, Will a man spoil his gods? and elsewhere; Have any Nation spent their gods, which yet are no gods? Go to the Isles of Kittim, and behold, and send to Kedar, and take diligent heed, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impiety of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Perſians alleged the burning of Cybele's Temple by the Athenians, when they set fire on the City of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the waste, which they made in burning of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterprize against Delphi, this vizor of holy and zealous reverence falling off, discovered the face of covetousness so much the more ugly, by how much the more themselves had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by their misbehaviour.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus: He came to Athens, which finding, for seditious, he took and burnt the Citadel and Temple which was therein. The Citadel indeed was defended a while by some of more courage than the widom, who literally interpreting Apollon's Oracle, That Athens should be safe in wooden walls, had fortified that place with Boards and Palisadoes; too weak to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might have yielded it upon tolerable conditions, had they not vainly relied upon the Prophecy: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done: Themistocles, to make direction the Interpreter, applying rather the words to the present need, than fashioning the business to words.

SECT. V.

How Themistocles the Athenian drew the Greeks to fight at Salamis.

THE Athenians had, before the coming of Xerxes, removed their Wives and Children into Traczen, Egina, and Salamis, not to highly prize their Houks and Lands, as their freedom, and the common liberty of Greece. Nevertheless, this great zeal, which the Athenians did shew for the general good of their Country, was ill requited by the other Greeks, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilst they removed their Wives and Children out of the City. But when the City of Athens was taken, it was presently resolved upon, that they should forsake the life of Salamis, and withdraw the Fleet to Ithaca: which neck of land they did purpose to fortify against the Persians, and to defend Peloponnesus by Land and Sea, leaving the rest of Greece undefensible, to the fury of the enemy. So should the Islands of Salamis and Egina have been abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of security) have been given over into mercile's bondage. Against this resolution Themistocles Admiral of the Athenian Fleet, very strongly made opposition, but in vain. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with fear of losing their own, which they would not hazard, that no persuasions could obtain of them to regard the estate of their distressed Friends and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made unto them, to allure them to abide the enemy at Salamis: As first in private unto Eurybiades the Lacedaemonian Admiral of the whole Fleet; That the self same fear which made them forsake those coasts of Greece upon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the first) cause them also to dislodge the Fleet, and every one of the Confederates to withdraw himself to the defence of his own City and Estate: Then to the Council of War, which Eurybiades upon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might work in them hereafter;) he shewed, that the fight at Ithaca would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, having the fewer Ships, to determine the matter in the straits; and that besides the safeguard of Egina, Megara, and Salamis, they should be abiding where they then were, sufficiently defend Ithaca, which the Barbarians should not so much as once look upon, if the Greeks obtained victory by Sea; which they could not so well hope for elsewhere, as in that present place which gave him to good advantage. All this would not serve to retain the Peloponnesians, of whom one unworthy of memory, upbraided Themistocles with the loss of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speak in the Council that had no Country of his own to inhabit. A haile and shameful objection it was, to lay as a reproach that loss, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignity did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a reply so sharp, as availed more than all his former persuasions. He told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer City than any Nation of Greece could boast of; having well near two hundred good Ships of War, the better part of the Grecian Fleet, with which it was easy for them to transpire their Families and substance into any part of the World, and settle themselves in a more secure habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremity had refused to stand by them. Here withal he mentioned a Town in Italy belonging of old to the state of Athens, of which Town he said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in process of time should build it anew; and there (quoth he) will we plant our selves, leaving unto you a sorrowful remembrance of my words, and of your own unthankfulness. The Peloponnesians hearing thus much, began to enter into better consideration of the Athenians, whose affairs depended not as they well perceived, upon so weak terms, that they should be driven to crouch to others; but rather were such as might enforce the rest to yield to them, and confederate even to the uttermost of their own demands.

For the Athenians when they first embraced that Heretical resolution, of leaving their grounds and houses to fire and ruin, if necessity should enforce them so far for the preservation of their liberty, did employ the most of their private wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Navy. By these means they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no such calamity should befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoised by great advantages at Sea. Knowing well, that a strong Fleet would either procure victory at home, or a secure passage to any other Country. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships, they did somewhat amend their Navy: Whereby it came to pass, that had they been vanquished, they could not have expected any other fortune than either present death, or perpetual slavery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athenians, whose forces by Sea did equal all theirs together; the whole consisting of more than three hundred and four score bottoms. Wherefore their Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their own condition, which would have stood upon desperate points if the Fleet of Athens had forsaken them; were soon persuaded by the greater fear of such a bad event, to forget the lesser, which they had conceived of the Persians, and laying aside their insolent bravery, they yielded to that most profitable counsel of abiding at Salamis.

How the Persians consulted about giving battle: and how Themistocles by policy led the Greeks to their resolution; with the victory at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

SECT. VI.

How the Persians consulted about giving battle: and how Themistocles by policy led the Greeks to their resolution; with the victory at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

IN the mean season the Persians had entered into consultation, whether it were convenient to offer battle to the Greeks, or no. The rest of the Captains giving such advice as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soon agreed upon the fight; but Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassus, who followed Xerxes to this War in person, was of contrary opinion: Her counsel was, that the King himself directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to pass, that the Greek Navy (unable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of provision) should presently be dislodged, and every one seeking to preserve his own City and Goods, they should being divided, prove unable to resist him, who had won so far upon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to give battle; so on the other side the danger will be need requireth us to adventure upon; and the loss in case it fall upon us, greater than the profit of the Victory which we desire. For if we compel the enemies to fly, it is more than they would have done, we sitting still: but if they as better Seamen than ours, put us to the worst, the journey to Peloponnesus is utterly dashed, and many that now declare for us, will soon revolt unto the Greeks. Mardonius whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the Fleet, related unto his Master the common consent of the other Captains, and withal this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her advice, yet resolved upon following the more general, but far worse counsel of the rest; which would questionless have been the same which Artemisia gave, had not fear and flattery made all the Captains utter that, as out of their own judgment, which they thought to be most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeed, that Xerxes had entertained a vain persuasion of much good that his own presence upon the shore to behold the conflict, would work among the Soldiers. Therefore he encamped upon the Sea-side, pitching his own Tent on the Mount Agaleus, which is opposite unto the life of Salamis, whence at ease he might fairly view all which might happen in that action, having Scribes about him to write down the acts and behaviour of every Captain. The near approach of the Barbarians, together with the news of that timorous diligence which their Countrymen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Army, marching apace thither, did now again so terrify and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no entreaty nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meer madness to fight for a Country already lost, when they rather should endeavour to save that which remained unconquered, propounding chiefly to themselves what misery would befall them, if losing the Victory, they should be driven into Salamis, there to be shut up, and besieged round in a poor desolate Island.

Hereupon they resolved forthwith to set sail for Ithaca, which had presently been done if the wisdom of Themistocles had not prevented it. For he perceiving what a violent fear had stopt up their ears against all good counsel, did practise another course, and forthwith labour to prevent the execution of this unwelcome decree; not suffering the very hour of performance to find him busied in wrangling altercation. As soon as the Council broke up, he dispatched secretly a trusty Gentleman to the Persian Captains, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Navy about the Island, which encompassing the Greeks, might prevent their escape; giving them withal false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than believed these good news, well knowing that the Victory was their own assured, if the Athenian Fleet joyned with them; which they might easily hope, considering what ability their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Captains with rich rewards, and the people with restitution of their City, and Territories. By these means it fell out, that when the Greeks very early in the morning were about to weigh Anchor, they found themselves inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all that night, sending many of their Ships about the life of Salamis, to charge the enemy in rear, and landing many of their men in the life of Psittalea, which lyeth over against Salamis, to save such of their own, and kill such of the Grecian party, as by any misfortune should be cast upon the shore. Thus did they necessarily enforce the Grecians to undertake the battle in the straits of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable Victory, stemming the foremost of their enemies, and chasing the rest, who falling foul one upon another, could neither conveniently fight nor fly. I do not find any particular occurrences in this great battle to be much remarkable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome task of writing down many disasters that befell the Persian Fleet, which ill acquitted it self that day, doing no one piece of service worthy the presence of their King, or the registering of his Notaries. As for the Greeks, they might well seem to have wrought out that Victory with equal courage, were it not that the principal honour of that day was ascribed to those of Egina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did fly towards Phalerus, where the Land Army of Xerxes lay, the ships of Egina having possit the Straights, did sink or take them, whilst the Athenians did valiantly give charge upon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

SECT. VII.

Of things following after the battel of Salamis: and of the flight of Xerxes.

AFter this Victory, the Greeks intending by way of scrutiny to determine which of the Captains had best merited of them in all this great service; every Captain being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write down his own name, but in the second place, as best deserving next unto himself, almost every Suffrage did concur upon Themistocles. Thus private affection yielded unto virtue, as soon as her own turn was served. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamity, began to make new preparation for continuance of War; but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper might easily discern cern his faint heart through his painted looks. Especially Mardonius Author of the War, began to cast a wary eye upon his Master, fearing lest his counsel should be rewarded according to the event. Wherefore purposing rather to adventure his life in pursuit of the Victory, than to cast it away by undergoing his Princes indignation, he advised the King to leave unto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces he promised to reduce all Greece under the subjection of the Persian Scepter. Herewith he forgot not to foother Xerxes with many fair words, telling him, That the cowardice of those Egyptians, Phœnicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like metal, nothing better than slaves, who had so like themselves in the late Scythia, twice did not concern his honour, who had always been victorious, and had already subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens itself, against which he now fought. These words found very good acceptance in the King's ear, who presently betook himself to his journey homewards, making the more haste, for that he understood, how the Greeks had a purpose to fail to Hellisport, and there to break down his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was, that the Greeks had no such intent, but rather wished his hasty departure, knowing that he would leave his Army not so strong as it should have been had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Peribrides give counsel, that by no means they should attempt the breaking of that Bridge, lest necessity should enforce the Persians to take more courage, and rather to fight like men than like beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, under pretence of friendship, send a false advertisement unto this timorous Prince, advising him to convey himself into Asia with all speed, before his Bridge were dissolved: which counsel Xerxes took very kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were so that he found the Bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torn in sunder by tempests, and he thereby driven to embark himself in some obscure vessel, it is not greatly material; though the Greeks did most willingly imbrace the latter of these reports. Howsoever it were, this flight of his did well ease the Country, that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which as Locusts had before overwhelmed it.

SECT. VIII.

The Negotiations between Mardonius and the Athenians, as also between the Athenians and the Lacedæmonians, after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thousand had withdrawn himself into Thessaly, whence he sent Alexander the son of Amintas King of Macedonia, as Ambassador to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses received; and of extending their Territories as far as their own desires; allowing them to retain their liberty and laws, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that War.

The Athenians had now re-entered their City, but not as yet brought back their wives and children; forasmuch as they well perceived that the place could not be secure till the Army of Mardonius was broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lac-

edæmonians understanding what fair conditions this Ambassador would propound, were perplexed with very great fear, lest he should find good and ready acceptance. Hereupon they likewise very speedily dispatched their Ambassadors for Athens, who arriving before the Macedonian had audience, told the best of their persuasion to retain the Athenians firm. They alleged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of War against the rest of Greece, but had only threatened the subversion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that City, were drawn into the quarrel, wherein the Athenians without much cruelty of injustice could not leave them. We know, said they, that ye have endured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driven to forsake the Town, the houses thereof to be ruined, and unfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we undertake to maintain as our own, your wives and children amongst us, as long as the War shall continue; hoping that ye who have always procured liberty to others, will not now go about to bring all Greece into slavery and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oaths are of no assurance. It was needful to use many arguments to the Athenians, who gave answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Ambassadors, That whilst the Sun continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither gold nor any riches, with which he might seek to make purchase of their liberty. Concerning the maintenance of their wives and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustain themselves; only desiring the Lacedæmonians, that with all speed they would cause their Army to march, forasmuch as it was not likely that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessaly, having once received such a peremptory answer. In this their opinion of Alexander his readiness to invade Attica, they found themselves deceived. For he, as soon as Alexander had returned their obituate purpose of resistance, did forthwith lead his Army towards them and their City: they having now the second time quitted it, and conveyed themselves into places of more security abroad in the Country, where they expected the arrival of their confederates. From Athens he sent his Agents unto them, with instructions not only to pervert them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded; but with great promises to allure the principal of them to his party. His hope was, that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses to fight, would be desirous to preserve them from fire, and to have those which were already laid waste, re-edified at the Kings charges: or, if this affection took no place with them, but that needs they would rely upon their old confederates, whose succours did very slowly advance forwards; yet perhaps the leaders might be won with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects, if they should fail, the destruction of Athens would be a good mean to please his Master King Xerxes, who must thereby needs understand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece in the strongest part of their own Country. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demetrius calls him) Cyrillus advised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propounded them to the people, all the Senators, and as many as abiding without the Council-house, heard what he had said, immediately

SECT. IX.

The great battle of Platæa.

It were too long a rehearsal to shew all that happened in many skirmishes between the Greeks and him, in the Country of Bœotia, which Mardonius had chosen to be the seat of that War. Much time was spent before the quarrel was decided by the trial of one main battle; for both parties did stand upon their guard, each expecting when the other should assault them.

The Army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Army; to whom were adjoined the forces of Thebes, Macedony, Thessaly, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persians, furnished his Camp with fifty thousand men. Against these the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates had levied an Army of one hundred and ten thousand; of which forty thousand were weightily armed, the rest were only assistants to these forty thousand, being armed more slightly, as rather to make excursions and give chase, than to sustain any strong charges.

These two Armies having eleven days confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of service; Mardonius, whose vicissitudes began to fail, resolved to begin the fray. The Greeks were promised Victory by an Oracle, if they fought in the Lund of the Athenians, and in the plain of Ceres and Proserpina, making prayers unto certain gods, Demigods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to find the certain place which the Oracle designed: For the plain of Ceres was indeed in the Territory of Athens; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, near unto the place where they lay at that time encamped; as likewise the memorials of those Nymphs and Demigods, were in the same place upon Mount Cithæron; and the ground served well for footmen against horse: only the Land belonged unto the Platæans, and not unto the Athenians.

Whilst the Greeks were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtful Oracle, the Platæans to make all clear, did freely bestow their Land on that side the Town upon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Platæans caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to re-edify their City; which was ruined in the Peloponnesian Wars.

All things being ready for battle, the Lacedæmonian General thought it most meet, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he with his Spartans should entertain the Thebans and other Greeks which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them oftentimes before. This being agreed upon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedæmonians; which Mardonius understanding, (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes and Persians had felt heavy proof, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the bravest Soldiers in Greece) he did also change the order of his Battle, and oppose himself to Pausanias. All the Greeks might well perceive how the Enemies did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did to molest the Greeks at their working place, that they were fain to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much loss to themselves, and more to the enemy, lye near to that fountain which did serve all the Camp. Having therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Army being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceed out of meer cowardice) he charged them in the rear with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valour, that the Lacedæmonians being overtaken by the enemies horse, and overwhelmed with great flights of Arrows, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slain, and some of especial mark lost, before any sign of good success appeared in the entrails.

But as soon as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens which the superstition of that Age and Country accounted fortunate, he gave the signal of batel; and thereupon the Soldiers, who till then did sit upon the ground, as was their manner, arose all together, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging upon them without any fear of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greek Army that was in march, being revoked by Pausanias, came in apace to succour the Lacedæmonians; only that part of the Army which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive unto the place of the great batel, because the Thebans and other Greeks confederated with the Persians, gave them check by the way. Nevertheless, the Spartans, with other their Alliances, did to well acquit themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slain in the field; the rest fled into the Camp, which they had fortified with wooden walls, and there defended themselves with such courage as desperate necessity enforced them unto; holding out the longer, because the Lacedæmonians were not acquainted with the manner of assaulting Fortresses and Walls. In the mean time the Athenians having found strong opposition of the Thebans and Thessalians, did with much labour and courage obtain victory; which having not long pursued, they came to help the Lacedæmonians, whom they found warily busied in assaulting the Camp with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselves undertook it, and in short space forced a passage thorow the Wall, at which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greeks entered with such fury, and just desire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand, they are said not to have left three thousand alive, excepting those who fled away with Artabanus, when as the Persian Army first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especial cause of it was the foolish retreat, or rather flight into the Camp. For, though it were so, that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who cast themselves into it, greater than any of the Alliances; yet they being of several Nations and Languages, and having lost their General, with other principal Commanders, it was impossible that they in such a terror and astonishment, should make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemy-Country, against an Army of men far more valiant than themselves, and inflamed with present victory. Therefore the same Wall which for a few hours had preserved their lives, by holding out the enemy, did now impale them, and leave them to the laughing fury of unspitful Victors. Artabanus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Thessaly, and other Countries in his way, that he was slain by Mardonius upon some piece of service: For he well knew, that had they understood any thing of that great discomfiture, all places would have been hostile unto him, and fought with his ruine to purchase favour of the vanquishers. Therefore making to large marches, that many of his Soldiers being feeble, were left behind and lost, he came to Bizantium, whence he shipped his men over into Asia. Such was the end of the vain-glorious Expedition undertaken by Xerxes against the Greeks, upon hope of Honour and Conquest, though forcing otherwife, accordingly as Artabanus had foreseen, and rather worse, forasmuch as it began the quarrel, which never ended before the ruin of the Persian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greeks, despised and sought to have been brought into slavery. Hereby it may seem, that the Vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himself, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subversion of the Persian Monarchy by the Greeks, who thus provoked, entered into greater consideration of their own strength, and the weakness of their Enemies.

SECT. X.

The batel of Mycale; with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning: and examples of the like.

THE same day on which the Batel was fought at Plataea, there was another Batel fought at Mycale, a Promontory, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian Fleet rode.

Lucyphides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greek Navy, at the request of some Islanders and Ionians, did sail into those parts to deliver the Samians, and procure the Ionians to revolt from the Persian. Xerxes himself at this time lay at Sardis a City in Lydia, not far from the Sea-side, having left threecore thousand under the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionian and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artemides and Libramires Admirals of the Persian Fleet, understood that the Greeks bent their course towards them, they did forthwith draw their ships aground, fortifying with Pallisades, and otherwise as much ground as was needful for the encompassing of all their Land and Sea-forces. Lucyphides at his arrival perceiving that they meant to keep within their strength, and resolving to force them out of it, rowed with his Galley close aboard the shore, and called upon the Ionians (who more for fear than good will, were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greek Tongue to remember liberty, and use the fair occasion which they now had to recover it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Salamis, trusting that either these persuasions would prevail, or if the Persians did happen to understand them, that it would breed some jealousy in them, causing them to fight in fear of their own companions. It need not seem strange, that this very false stratagem, which little or nothing availed Themistocles, did now very happily succeed. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficulty to

perilvade those Inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now in his declining estate, gave a willing ear to the sweet sound of liberty. The Persians likewise, who in their former bravery little regarded, and less feared any treason to be contrived by their subjects, were now so wary, that from the Samians which were amongst them, they took away their arms; the Milesians whom they did suspect, but would not seem to mistrust, they placed far from them, as it were for defence of the freight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these devices little availed them. For the Samians perceiving that they were held as Traitors, took courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold upon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Camp, which examples the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to have found some that durst begin. It is said, that while the Greeks were yet in a march toward the Enemies Camp, a rumour suddenly ran in the Army, that Mardonius was overthrown in Greece, which (though perhaps it was given out by the Captains to encourage the Soldiers) was very true. For the Batel of Plataea was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the evening of the same day.

The like report of that great Batel, wherein Paulus Emilius overthrew Perseus the last King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in four days, as Livy with others do record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kind. As that of the Batel by the River Sagra in Italy, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the Batel against the Tarquinius and the Latins, presently notified at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victory obtained against Lucius Antonius who was Rebel to Romanian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germany, had corrupted his Army with gifts and promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himself Emperour; which news much troubling the City of Rome, with fear of a dangerous War, it was suddenly reported that Antonius was slain, and his Army defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of public joy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquiry was made, and the Author of their tydings could not be found, the Emperour Romanian betook himself to his journey against the Rebel, and being now with his Army in march, he received advertisement by Post of the Victory obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembering the rumour noted before in Rome of the self-same Victory, he found that the report and victory were born upon one day, though twenty thousand furlongs (which make above five and twenty hundred miles) asunder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example gives credit unto many the like. And indeed it were very strange if among so many rumors begotten by forgery or mishearsings, and followed by credulous imagination, there should not be found (as happens in dreams among many thousand vain and frivolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit we may find, that God himself doth sometimes use to certify those who presume upon their own strength, by these light means of tumultuous noises: as he raised the siege of Samaria, by causing a found of Horles and Chariots to affright the Arameites; and as he threatened Senacherib, saying, Behold I will send a blast upon him, and he shall bear a noise, and return to his own Land. Wherefore it may well have been true, that God was pleased by such means as this to animate the Greeks; who (as Hierodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with hearty hearts, being in great fear lest their own adventure should by no means fall out well; confiding in what danger they had left their own Country of Greece which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius, whilst they went wandering to kick out Enemies afar off, upon the coast of Asia. But the fame of the Batel fought at Plataea being notified among them, every man desired that his own valour in the present fight might be some help to work out the full deliverance of Greece. In this clativity of spirit they divided themselves into two Battalions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the Plain, directly towards the Enemies Camp; the Lacedæmonians conducted the other, by the Mountains and freight passages, to win the higher ground. The Athenians did first set upon the Camp (e're the Lacedæmonians could arrive on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did to forcibly assault it, that they brake way thorow the Pallisades and Gabions, and made themselves Masters of the place, flaying all that could not face themselves by flight. In this fight the Sannus did good service, as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milesians who upon the top of Mycale, were placed by the Persians on the spots of Mycale, to defend the passages, did now (as if they had been sent of purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except very few that fled through by-paths. The Lacedæmonians that day did little service, for the business was dispatched e're they came in: Only they broke such companies as retired in whole troops; making them flee dispersed in very much disorder, whereby the Milesians were enabled to do the greater execution upon them. This was the last fight of the huge Army levied against Greece, which was now utterly broken, and had no means left to make otherwise War.

SECT. XI.

Of the barbarous qualities of Xerxes: with a transition from the Persian affairs to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

Xerxes lay at Sardis, not far from the place of this Batel; but little mind had he to revenge either this, or other his great losses, being wholly given over to the love of his Brothers Wife; with whom he could not prevail by intreaty, nor would obtain his desire by force. Because he respected much his Brother her Husband, he thought it best to make a match between his own Son Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that means to find occasion of such familiarity as might work out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastity of the Mother did fill reject him, or the beauty of the Daughter allure him, he soon after fell in love with his own Sons Wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to govern himself in peace, as to guide his Army in War. This young Lady having once desired the King to give her the Garment which he then wore, being wrought by his own Wife, caused the Queen thereby to perceive her Husbands conversation with her, which he imputed not to much to the beauty of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon the conceived execration lay. Therefore at a Royal Feast, wherein the custom was, that the King should grant their request, she craved that the Wife of Majestes, her Husbands Brother, the young Ladies Mother, might be given into her disposition. The barbarous King who might either have reformed the abuse of such a custom, or have deluded the importunate cruelty of his Wife, by threatening her self with the like, to whatsover she should inflict upon the innocent Lady, granted the request; and sending for his Brother, persuaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seems that he understood how villainously that poor Lady should be intrusted, whom he knew to be virtuous, and whom himself had loved. Majestes refused to put her away; alleging his own love, her deserving, and their common children, one of which was married to the Kings Son, as reasons important to move him to keep her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reviled him, saying, That he now should neither keep the Wife which he had, nor have his Daughter whom he had promised unto him. Majestes was much grieved with these words, but much more, when returned home he found his Wife most brutally mangled by the Queen Amistis who had caused her Nose, Lips, Ears, and Tongue to be cut off; and her Breasts in like manner, which were cast unto Dogs. Majestes enraged with this villany, took his way with his children and some friends towards Bactria, of which Province he was Governour, intending to rebel and avenge himself: But Xerxes understanding his purpose, caused an Army to be levied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his company to the sword. Such was the Tyrannical condition of the Perfian Government; and such are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is joined with absolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much virtue. And therefore Alexander the Great finding an Image of his overthrow, and lying upon the ground, said, That he doubted whether in regard of his virtue he should again erect it; or for the mischief done by him to Greece, should let it lie. But surely, whatsoever his other good qualities were, he was foolish, and was a coward, and consequently mercilefs.

Therefore we may firmly believe, that the virtue of Cyrus was very great, upon which the foundation of the Perfian Empire was to surely laid; that all the wickedness and vanities of Xerxes and other worse Princes could not overthrow it, until it was broken by a virtue almost equal to that which did establish it. In Wars against the Egyptians the fortune of Xerxes did continue as at the first it had been, very good; but against the general estate of Greece, neither he or any of his posterity did ever make offensive War but received many losses in Asia, to which the last at Mysale served but as an introduction; teaching the Greeks, and especially the Athenians, that the Perfian was no better Soldier at his own doors than in a foreign Country: whereof good trial was made forthwith, and much better proof as soon as the affairs of Athens were quietly settled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the History of Greece, taking in the matters of Perfian, as also the estate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Perfian estate continued in her greatness many ages following, in such wise that the known parts of the world had no other Kingdom representing the Majesty of a great Empire.

But this greatness depended only upon the riches and power that had formerly been acquired, yielding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxury wherewith both it and all, or the most of Empires that ever were, have been enervated, made unwieldy, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry swords of poor and hardy Enemies. Hereby it came to pass that Xerxes and his successors were fain to defend their Crowns with money and base policies; very seldom or never (unless it were with great advantage) daring to adventure the trial of plain battle with that little Nation of Greece; which would soon have ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not private malice and jealousy urged every City to envy the height of her neighbours Walls, and thereby diverted the swords of the Greeks into their own bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better have continued to hew out the way of Conquest on the side of Asia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Perfian War, to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

SECT. I.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

After that the Medes and Perfians had recovered their last blow, and were utterly beaten at Mysale: Leutychides who then commanded the Gracian Army, leaving the pursuit of the War to the Athenians, assisted by the revolted Iones, returned with the Lacedæ- monians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta, and overthrew them in the mean while besieged Sifos, a City on the Strait of the Hellepont, between which and Abydos Xerxes had lately fastened his Bridge of Boats: where the Inhabitants desperate of succor, did did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greeks, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellepont: In the Spring they drew homeward, and having left their wives and children since the invasion of Asia, and the abandoning of Athens in divers Islands, and at Traxen; they now found them all, and returned with them to their own places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken down, and the walls of the City overturned; yet they resolved first on their common defence, and to fortify their City, before they cared to cover themselves, their wives and children, with any private buildings. Whereof the Lacedæmonians being adverted, and mistaking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their own City of Sparta was unwall'd, as also because the Athenians were grown more powerful by Sea than either themselves or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; not acknowledging any private dislike or jealousy, but pretending, that if the Perfians should return to invade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than heretofore, the same would serve to receive their enemies, and to be made a feat for the War, as Thebes had lately been. To this the Athenians promised to give them satisfaction by their own Embassadors very speedily.

But being resolved to go on with their works, by the advice of Themistocles they held the Lacedæmonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raised their walls to that height, as they cared not for their milks, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gain time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedæmon, giving him for excuse, that he could not deliver the Athenians resolutions, till the arrival of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedæmonians expectation being converted into jealousy: (for by the arrival of divers persons out of Asia, they were told for certain, That the walls of Athens were speedily grown up beyond expectation), Themistocles prayed them not to believe reports and vain rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their own trusty Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolve themselves, and determine accordingly. Their request being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his own, by whom he advised the Athenians, first to entertain the Lacedæmonians with some such discourse as might retain them a few days; and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himself and the other Athenian Embassadors then at Sparta, had their liberty also to return. Which done, and being also assured by his associates, and Arifrides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedæmonians know, That it was true that the Walls of Athens were now raised to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their City; praying the Lacedæmonians to believe, That whenever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such as right well understood what appertained to a Commonwealth, and their own safety, without direction and advice from any other: That they had in the War of Xerxes abandoned their City; and committed themselves to the wooden Walls of their Ships, from the resolutions of their own counsels and courage, and not thereto taught or perwaded by others: and finally, in all that perilous War against the Perfians, they found their own judgments, and the execution thereof, in nothing inferior or less fortunate than that of any other Nation, State, or Commonwealth among the Greeks. And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Judges of their own affairs; and thought it good reason, That either all the Cities confederated within Greece, should be left open, or else that the Walls of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedæmonians finding the time unfit for quarrel, dismissed their milks, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the division; and suffered the Athenians to depart, and received back from them their own Embassadors.

The Walls of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyram, by which they might under covert embark themselves upon all occasions.

SECT. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatness, and prosperous War made by that State upon the Perfian.

THE Athenians having settled things in good order at home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the War against the Perfians; to which the Lacedæmonians added other twenty: and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set sail for Cyprus, under the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedæmonian; where, after their landing, having possessed themselves of many principal places, they embarked the Army again, and took land in Thrace, recovering from the Perfians by force the City of Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behaving himself more like a Tyrant than a Captain, especially towards the Ionians lately revolted from Xerxes, was called back by the Council of Lacedæmon, and not only accused of many insolent behaviours, but of Intelligence with the Medes, and Treason against his Country. In his stead they employed Demeter, who either gave the same cause of offence, or else the Athenians, who affected the first commandment in that War, praised the Soldiers to complain; though indeed the wife and virtuous behaviour of Arifrides, General of the Athenian Forces, a man of rare and incomparable sincerity, had been able to make a good Commander seem ill in comparison of himself; and therefore was much more available in rendering those detested whose vices afforded little matter of excuse. Howsoever it were, the Lacedæmonians being no less wearied of the War than the Athenians were eager to pursue it, the one obtained their call, and the other the execution and honour which they desired: for all the Greeks (those of Peloponnesus excepted) willingly subjected themselves to the commandment of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatness in that present age, and of their ruin in the next succeeding. For the charge of the War being now committed unto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities; they appointed Receivers and Treasurers, and began to levy money according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the general defence of Greece, and for the recovering of those places on Europe side in Asia the left, and the Islands from the Perfians. This tribute (the first that was ever paid by the Greeks) amounted to four hundred and threefold Talents, which was raised easily by the honest care of that just man Arifides, to whose discretion all the Confederates referred themselves, and no one man found occasion to complain of him. But as the virtue of Arifides, and other worthy Citizens, brought unto the Athenians great commodity; so the desire which they conceived of increasing their commodity corrupted their virtue, and robbing them of the general love which had made them powerful, abandoned their City to the defence of her Treasure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long ere their four hundred and threefold Talents were raised to six hundred; nor long after that, ere their covetous tyranny had converted their followers into slaves, and extorted from them yearly thirteen hundred Talents. The life of Delos was at the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these sums were laid up, and where at the general Assembly the Captains of those forces sent by the Confederates, were for form sake called to consultation. But the Athenians who were stronger by Sea than all Greece besides, had lockt up the common Treasure in an Island under their own protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The general Commander in this War was Cimon the son of Miltiades, who first took Eionia upon the River Sirmon; then the Isle of Sciros inhabited by the Dolopes; they mastered the Caristis, and brought into servitude the Naxii, contrary to the form of the Confederacy: So did the other inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their contribution, or disobeyed their commands; taking upon them, and usurping a kind of sovereign authority over the rest: which they exercised the more assuredly, because they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be resisted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, weary of the War in their own persons, and given up altogether to their ease, made choice rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of War, or in Ships; leaving the provision of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weak in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Wars; the other greatly strengthened their Navy and their experiences, being always armed and employed in honourable services, at the cost of those who having lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-money levied upon these their confederates, employed to well by the Athenians at the first (as all proceedings are often founded upon good beginnings) that no great cause of repining was given. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admiral fouling the Afatick Seas took in the City of Phaselis; which having formerly pretended neutrality, and refused to relieve, or any way assist the Greeks, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a fine, and to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearly contri. union.

From thence he set sail for the River Euryandron in Amphylia, where the Persian Fleet rode, being of six hundred sail, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fifty, and having a great Land-Army encamped upon the shore; all which forces having been provided for advancing the Kings affairs in Greece, were utterly defeated in one day, and two hundred ships taken by the Athenians; the rest being broken to pieces or sunk; ere ever they had swum in the Greekish Seas. Cimon having in one day obtained two great Victories, the one by Sea, and the other by Land, was very soon presented with a third. For fourscore sail of Phoenicians (who were the best of all Sea-men, under the Persian command) thinking to have joined themselves with the Fleet before destroyed, arrived upon the time Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and feared nothing less than what ensued. Upon the first notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-land called Hydras, did so amaze them, that they only fought to run themselves on ground; by which mean preserving few of their men, they lost all their ships. These losses did to break the courage of the Persians; that omitting all hope of prevailing upon Greece, he condemned to whatsoever Articles it pleased the Athenians to propound, granting liberty unto all the Greeks inhabiting Asia; and further Covenanting, That none of his ships of War should fail to the Westward of the Isles called Cyanea and Chelidonia.

This was the most honourable peace that ever the Greeks made; neither did they in effect after this time make any War that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till such time as under Alexander they overthrew the Empire of Persia; in which War few, or perhaps none of them had any place of great command, but served altogether under the Macedonians.

SECT. III.

The death of Xerxes by the Treason of Artabanus.

BESIDES the losses which could not easily have been repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time such as gave just cause to the Persian of seeking peace upon any terms not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus the Uncle of Xerxes, perceiving that the King his Master did easily take small occasions to shed the blood of such in kindred or place were near unto him, began to repose less hope of safety in remaining faithful, than of obtaining the Sovereignty by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his cruelty and delighted for his cowardice and misfortunes. Having conceived this Treason he found means to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himself had been innocent) he caused Darius the Son of Xerxes, and caused him to suffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickedness he got the Kingdom, and held it seven months; or whether intending the like evil to Artaxerxes the son of Xerxes, he was by him prevented and surprized, were hard to affirm any certainly. But all Writers agree upon this, That taken he was, and with his whole family put to death by extreme tortments; according to the sentence, wherof the truth is more ancient than the Verbe:

Deseruit pede pona claudo.*

Seldom the villain, though much haste he make,
Lame-footed Vengeance fails to overtake.

SECT.

SECT. IV.

The Banishment of Themistocles: his flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Persia; and his death.

ARTAXERXES being established in his Kingdom, and having to compound with the Athenians as the present necessity of his affairs required, began to conceive new hopes of better fortune against the Greeks, than he or his Predecessors had ever hitherto found. For the people of Athenis, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did so highly value their own merit in that service, that they not only thought it fit for themselves to quell seemed cause both to make and to maintain; that they not only thought it fit for themselves to become the Commanders over many Towns and Islands, they would admit none other form of Government than merely Democratical. Herein they were so insolent, that no integrity nor good desert was able to preserve the estate of any such as had born great office longer than by flattering the rascal multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deeds to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatness upon popularity, yet now presuming upon his good services done to the State, he thought that with great reason they might grant him the liberty to check their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearsing the benefits which they had received from him, that they laid upon him the punishment of Ostracism, whereby he was banished for ten years, as a man over-burthened to the Commonwealth.

Before the time of his return was half expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedaemonians, who charged him of consulting with Pausanias about betraying the whole Country of Greece unto Xerxes. Hereupon Themistocles finding no place of security against the malice of two such mighty Cities, was driven after many troublefome flights, and dangerous removings, to adventure himself into Persia, where he found Artaxerxes newly settled, and was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceived of advancing his affairs by the counsel and assistance of Themistocles, proved altogether fruitless. For when the Athenians in favour of Inarus the Libyan, who infected Egypt, causing it to rebel against the Persian had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Army in Egypt, and scowred those Eastern Seas, to the great hindrance of Artaxerxes, (or ought that I can understand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had given of assuring the Persian estate against the Greeks.

But whether Themistocles perceived much unlikelihood of good success, in leading a great Army of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in favour of his virtue it is more commonly reported) the love of his Country would not permit him to seek honour by the ruin of it; sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to undertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict between thankfulness to his well-deserving Prince, and natural affection to his own ill-deserving people by finishing his life with a cup of poison.

SECT. V.

How the Athenians breaking the peace which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Egypt.

THEN was Artaxerxes driven to use the service of his own Captains in the Egyptian War, wherein it appeared well, That a just cause is a good defence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred sail strong, was sent forth unto Cimon, to take in the life of Cyprus; which conquest seemed easy both to make and to maintain; the Persian being utterly broken at Sea, and therefore by unable to relieve the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had been concluded, which was likely to have been kept sincerely by the Persians, who had made so good proof of the Gracians valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any Ships of War (without which the Greeks could receive no harm from him) whereof if any one should be found failing towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken; and if not his whole estate, yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waste of an enemy too far over-matching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, he left the league which in his own worlde fortunes he had made with them, he would break in theirs; and therefore fought to get such assistance into their hands, as might utterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their revenues and power, by adding that rich and great Island to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profit; they thought it the wisest way to take whilst they might whatsoever they were able to get and hold, and so unable to defend.

The life of Cyprus lying in the bottom of the Straights between Cilicia, Syria, and Egypt, is very fitly desired for any Prince or State that being mighty at Sea, doth either seek to enrich himself by trade with those Countreys, or to infect one more of them with his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already devoured in conceit this Island, was on the sudden well-nigh choaked with a greater morsel, to snatch at which they let Cyprus undigested. For Inarus King of the Lybians confining Egypt, having found how greatly the Country was exalted by the late Wars, and how weakly defended by very slender Persian Garrisons, conceived rightly, that if such small forces as the Satrapas, or Viceroy, could make on the sudden of his own Guards, or levy out of the ordinary Garrisons, were by him defeated, the naturals of the Country not long since oppressed by Cambyses, and after a revolt lately subdued by Xerxes, would soon break divided himself that the people unable to defend themselves against the Persian without his assistance, would easily be drawn to accept him the author of their deliverance, for King. Neither did this hope deceive him. For having taken and cruelly slain Achamenes the Viceroy, divers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclaiming him King, shewed the most of their endeavour for prosecution of the War. But he considering his own weakness, and that the means of the Egyptians his adherents adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceived well that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, far greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured at what price soever he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian Fleet, and knowing well the virtue of the Soldiers therein embarked; he invited the Commanders to share with him the Kingdom of Egypt as a far greater reward of their adventure, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their estate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly turned according to their expectation) would have been contented with an equal share, and not have fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a divination unnecessary. He was possessed of the peoples love, they were of much power. But the issue of those affairs was less left them, nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally.

Yet had the beginning of their enterprise very good and hopeful success: For they entered the Land as far as to Memphis the principal City; and of the City it self they took two parts: to the third part which was called the White Wall, they laid such hard siege, that neither those forces of the Perians which then were in Egypt were strong enough to remove them; neither could Artaxerxes well advise what means to use for the recovery of that which was lost, or for the preservation of the remainder. The best of his hope was, by setting the Lacedæmonians upon Athenians, to enforce the Athenians to look homeward to their own defence. This was the first time that the Perian sought to procure the assistance of the Greeks: on the other, by stirring them up with Gold to the entertainment of private quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpose he sent Agabazus to Scania with much Treasure; who after great expense, finding that the Lacedæmonians were nothing so ready in employing their whole force against the Perians, whom in many conflicts of great valour they had found to be their enemies, and considering the absence of their Army in Egypt, he thought it his wisest way to employ the rest of his money and means to their relief who had now the space of six years defended their masters right in Egypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his name, the son of Zopyrus, who arriving in Egypt, was first encountered by the Perians revolted people; over whom he obtained victory, which made him master of the Country, whilst the Athenians, who Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great City.

It cannot be doubted that long abode in a strange air, and want of supply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: first it is that when Megabazus having reduced the Country to obedience, attempted the City it self, whether his former success had diminished the courage of the Perians, or want of necessity made the Athenians inferior to themselves, he chafed them out of Memphis, and pursued them so near as they were forced to fortify themselves in the life of Protopites, where Megabazus after Diades: the River by divers Trenches, assaulted the Athenians without impediment of waters, took their camp of Galles, and put all to the sword, save a few that fled: Megabazus followed them, and they fled into Lybia: the same day, ten thousand men, and eight hundred Gallies, which they sent into the succour of the first two hundred. For the City those Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleet and Army was consumed, entered by the branch of Nilus, which is called Mendesium, and fell unawares among the Phonician Gallies, and the Perian Army; so as the Perians recovered all Egypt, but that part held by Amyntus; and Isarus the King of Lybia being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians six years War in Egypt, and the reward of their vanity and indelication to undertake many enterprises at once.

SECT. VI.

Of other Wars made by the Athenians for the most part with good success, about the same time.

Notwithstanding these overthrows in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their home-Wars were wedded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedæmonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten near unto Halicia, by the Corinthians and Epidaurians; so they obtained two great victories soon after, the one over the Peloponnesians near unto Ceryphalia; the other over the Aeginets near unto Aegina, where they sunk and carried away threecore and ten Gallies of their enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the sudden, and besieged Argina, from whence they could not be moved, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to divert them, invaded Atara; where, after a great fight with equal loss, the Corinthians, when they returned again to set up their Trophies as Victors in the former battle, were utterly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons and Megarians, to their great loss and dishonour.

Again, as the Athenians were discomfited near to Tangra, by the Lacedæmonians, who returned from the succour of the Darians against the Phonicians (at which time the Thessalians Horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them); so about threecore days after, the Athenians entered Bautia under the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they wan Phocis on the gulf of Oetius, and evened the Walls of Tangra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Aegina to render upon most base conditions, as to beat down the Walls of their City, and to give them hostages for Tribute; the siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other troubles and attempts elsewhere. Besides their victories, they sackt and spoiled many places upon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedæmonians; wan upon the Corinthians, and overthrew the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These were the undertakings of the Athenians and their Allies, during the time of those six years that a part of their forces made War in Egypt. In the end whereof, they attempted Thesphaly, persuaded thereto by Orestes, but were resisted by the King Pharphalus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicyonia, and had victory over those that resisted; after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for five years, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ships; but they were again allured by Agonitus, one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marsh and Woody parts of Egypt from the Perians, to whom they sent sixty of their ships. The rest of their Army failing in their enterprise at Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the Island, encountered encountered a Fleet of the Phonicians and Cilicians; over both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned safe which were sent into Egypt.

SECT. VII.

Of Artaxerxes Longimanus: that he was Abahlueroth the Husband of Queen Hester.

These Egyptian Troubles being ended, the reign of Artaxerxes continued peaceable; whereof the length is by some restrained unto twenty years; but the more and better Authors give him forty, some allow unto him four and forty. He was a Prince of much humanity, and noted for many examples of gentleness. His favour was exceedingly great to the Jews, as appears by the Histories of *Esdra*s and Nehemiah, which fell in his time.

To prove that this was the King who gave countenance and aid to that great work of building the Temple; it were a needless travel; considering that all the late Divines have taken very much pains to shew, that those two Prophets were licensed by him, and succoured in that building, in such sort as appears in their writings.

This was likewise that King Abahlueroth who married Hester. Whereof it is be needful to give proof, it may suffice, that Abahlueroth lived in Susa, reigning from India to Ethiopia, and therefore must have been a Persian; that he lived in peace, as appears by the circumstances of the History, and used the counsel of the seven Princes, the authority of which Princes began under Darius the son of Hystaspes; wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyses.

The continual Wars which exercised King Darius the son of Hystaspes, together with the certainty of his marriages with sundry Wives, from none of whom he was divorced, but left his first Wife Ansis the daughter of Cyrus alive in great honour, (he being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King), do manifestly prove that Hester was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Jew, That at the persuasion of Mardochæus, Joachim the High Priest the son of Jesha, caused the feast of Parim to be instituted in memory of that deliverance. Now the time of Joachim was in the reign of Artaxerxes at the coming of *Esdra*s and Nehemiah: Jesha his father dying about the end of Darius:

The same continuance of Wars with other his furious and tragical loves wherewith Xerxes did consume such little time as he had free from War, are enough to prove that the story of Hester pertained not unto the time of Xerxes, who lived but one and twenty years, whereas the two and thirtieth of Abahlueroth or Artaxerxes is expressed by Nehemiah. Again, it is well known that Xerxes in the seventh year of his reign (wherein this marriage must have been celebrated) came not near to Susa. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to prove that none of them could be Abahlueroth, it is enough to say, that Mardochæus having been carried from Hierusalem captive, with Tebachnia, by Nabuchadnezzar, was unlikely to have lived until their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he lived in Susa, reigned from India to Ethiopia, lived in peace, was contemporary with Joachim the high Priest, and further he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Egyptians in that seventh year of his reign; which good fortune might well give occasion to such a Royal Feast as is described in the beginning of Hester. This is the sum of the arguments brought to prove the age of Hester: story by the learned and diligent Krentzheim who adds the authorities of Josephus affirming the fame, and of Philo giving to Mardochæus eighteen years more than Isaac the Patriarch lived, namely one hundred fourscore and eighteen years in all, which expire in the five and thirtieth year of this Artaxerxes, if we suppose him to have been carried away captive, being a Boy of ten years old.

SECT. VIII.

Of the troubles in Greece, forgoing the Peloponnesian War.

But it is fit that we now return to the affairs of the Greeks, who from this time forwards, more vehemently prosecuting their Civil Wars, suffered the Perians for many ages to rest in peace, this Egyptian Expedition being come to nought. Soon after this the Lacedæmonians undertook the War called Sacred, recovered the Temple and life of Delphos, and delivered both to the Inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the fame, and gave it in charge to the Phocians. In the mean while the banished Baotians re-entered their own Land, and mastered two of their own Towns posselt by the Athenians, which they soon recovered again from them; but in their return towards Athenians the Athenians set upon them with such resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all slain or taken, whereby the Baotians recovered their former liberty, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Islanders of Eubœa took such courage upon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was advertised that the Megarians (who first left the Lacedæmonians and submitted themselves to Athenians) being now weary of their yoke, had slain the Athenian Garrisons, and joined themselves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and Epidaurians. These news hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speed; but ere he could recover Attica, the Peloponnesians led by Plisphaanax the son of Panfanias, had invaded it, pillaged and burnt many parts thereof, after whole return Pericles went on with his first intent, and recovered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yielded to deliver up all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponnesus: and this truce was made for thirty years.

After six of these years were expired, the Athenians (favoured the Mysefians against the Sarmians) invaded Samos by Pericles; and after many repulses, and some great losses both by Sea and Land, the Citizens were forced to yield up themselves upon most lamentable conditions: Namely, to deliver up all their ships, to break down their own Walls, to pay the charge of the War, and to restore whatsoever had been taken by themselves, or by their practice from the Athenians. In the neck of which followed that long and cruel Peloponnesian War, whereof I have gathered this Brief following: the same contention taking beginning fifty years after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no City thereof, which either in the beginning of this War, or in the continuance of it, was not drawn into the quarrel; I hold it convenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Country at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities Athens and Sparta, upon which all the rest had most dependence.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian War.

SECT. I.

Upon what terms the two principal Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, stood at the beginning of the Peloponnesian War.

Greece was never united under the Government of any one Prince or Estate until Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to Union and League against the Persians, whereof they were Captains, than into any absolute subjection. For every Estate held their own, and were governed by Laws far different, and by their own Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yield obedience no otherwise than as to such who were (perforce) their Leaders in the Persian War (demed the general quarrel of Greece) and took the profit and honour of the victory to their own use and increase of greatness. But the Kings which afterwards reigned in Macedonia did so far enlarge their authority, that all Greece was by them brought under such obedience as differed little from servitude; very few excepted who could hardly sometimes with arms, and sometimes with gifts preserve their liberty: of whom the Lacedemonians and Athenians were chief; which two people deserved best the plague of Tyranny, having first given occasion thereunto by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Country by perpetual War. For until these two Cities of Athens and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing every State into the quarrel on the one or other side, and so gave beginning to the Peloponnesian War (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not before the time that Philip had overthrown all, forasmuch as every conclusion of one War afforded henceforth matter of some new distraction of the whole Country) the Wars commenced between one City of Greece and another, were neither great nor of long continuance. All controversies were soon decided, either by the authority of the Amphictiones, who were the general Council of Greece; or by the power of the Lacedemonians, whose aid was commonly held as good as the assurance of victory.

Their Lacedemonians had lived about four hundred years under one form of Government when the Peloponnesian War began. Their education was only to practise feats of Arms, wherein they excelled, that a very few of them were thought equal to very great numbers of any other people. They were poor, and cared not much for wealth; every one had an equal portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintain him in such manner as they used. For bravery they had none, and curious-building or apparel they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinary meals being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They used Money of Iron, whereof they could not be covetous, nor great hoarders. Briefly, they lived Utopian-like, save that they used no other occupation than War, placing all their felicity in the glory of their valour. Hence it came to pass, that in all enterprises whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this. For they fought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they used mercenary Soldiers in their Wars, and exacted great tribute of their Subjects, which were for the most part Islanders compelled to obey them, because the Athenian Fleet was great.

As in form of policy and in course of life, so in conditions natural, the difference between these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, fudden in their conclusions, and as hasty in the execution. The Lacedemonians very slow in their deliberations, full of gravity, but very resolute, and such as would in cold blood perform what the Athenians did usually in flagrant. Whereby it came to pass, that the Lacedemonians had all the Estates of Greece depending upon them, as on men firm and assured, that fought honour and not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in freight subjection. But the Signory of the Athenians was nothing large, until such time as the Persian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending only a quarrel to Athens: For then the Citizens perceiving well that the Town of Athens could not be defended against his great Army of seventeen hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth upon a Navy, and (assisted by the other Grecians) overthrew the Fleet of Xerxes, whose Land-forces were soon after discomfited by them and the Greeks, who all served under conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in Fleet, reduced all the Islands of the Grecish Seas under their obedience; imposing upon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of War against the Persians; though indeed they employed their forces chiefly to the conquest of such Islands and Haven-Towns of their Countrymen as stood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedemonians, who were Islanders, and men that delighted not in Expeditions to be made far from home. But afterwards perceiving the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much jealousy, and were very apt to quarrel with them; but much more willing to breed contention between them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would have oppressed the Plataeans, when they of Plataea repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aid than this advice, That they should seek help at Athens. Hence it was thought that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious War with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proved otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did only serve to encrease their honour and puissance.

SECT. II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into War.

Nevertheless many Estates of Greece were very ill-affected to Athens, because that City grew very insolent upon sudden prosperity, and maintaining the weaker Towns against the stronger, interposed apace upon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much enraged, because the people of the Island Coryra their Colony which had rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their Fleet by adjoining that of Coryra unto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby defeated of that revenge which else they would have taken. Now howsoever it were so that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed upon among the Greeks, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much ado) they concluded to redress by War the injuries done to their Allies.

First therefore, seeking Religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certain offences committed against the gods; whereto having for answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences committed in Sparta, they began to deal plainly, and required that the people of some Towns oppressed by the State of Athens should be set at liberty; and that a Decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reversed. This last point they so earnestly pressed, that if they might obtain it, they promised to abstain from their purpose of making War.

This they desired not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle), but only that by seeming to have obtained somewhat, they might preserve their reputation without entering into a War, which threatened them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to undergo.

But the Athenians would yield to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice how far they were from fear of any other City. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needful to the War, wherein the Lacedemonians were superior both in number and quality, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece, and having the general favour as men that pretended to set at liberty such as were oppressed: but the Athenians did as far exceed them in all provisions of money, shipping, engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held, and afterward found of greater use in such need than the willing readiness of friends, who soon grow weary, and are not easily assembled.

SECT. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian War.

The first and second years Expedition was very grievous to the City of Athens. For the Fields were wasted, the Trees cut down, the Country people driven to fly, with Wives, Children, and Cattel into the Town; whereby a most furious Pestilence grew in the City, such as before they had never felt nor heard of. Hereunto was added the revolt of the Aphyllians in the Isle of Leibos, and the siege of Plataea their confederated City, which they durst not adventure to raise, besides some small overthrows received. The Lacedemonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Country of Attica, and therein abide until victuals began to fail, waiting and destroying all things round about. The Governors of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their enemies: but used to send a Fleet into Peloponnesus, which waited as fast all the Sea-coast of their enemies, whilst they were making War in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, won the Town of Plataea which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that War the Lacedemonians began to perceive how unfit they were to deal with such enemies. For after that Attica was thoroughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to do any offence equal to such harm as they themselves might and did receive. The Confederates began to let forward very slowly in their Expeditions into Attica; perceiving well that Athens was plentifully relieved with all necessities, which came by the Sea from the Islands that were subject unto that Estate; and therefore these Invaders took but small pleasure in beholding the Walls of that mighty City, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a pattern of the calamities with which their own Territory was the whilst afflicted. Wherefore they began to set their care to build a strong Navy, wherein they had little good success, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skilful in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

SECT. IV.

Of the great loss which the Spartans received at Pylos.

Among other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea, they received at Pylos a very sore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A Fleet of Athenian ships bound for Coryra, waiting in that passage (as their manner was) the Coast of Laconia, and all the half-life of Peloponnesus, was by contrary winds detained at Pylus, which a rugged Promontory joining to the Main by a strange neck of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Island of less than two miles compass, and within that a Creek, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being born off by the headland and life. This Promontory the Athenians fortified as well as in haste they might; and what was wanting in their artificial fortification, was supplied by the natural strength and site of the place. By holding this piece of ground and haven, they in reason expected many advantages against their enemies. For the Country adjoining was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient times had held very strong and cruel War with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in freight subjection; yet was not the old hatred to extinguish'd, that by the near neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians it might not be revived. Furthermore it was thought that many ill-willers to the Lacedæmonians, and as many of their bond-slaves as could escape from them, would repair to Pylus, and from thence make daily incursions into Laconia, which was not far off: Or, if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this Haven, lying almost in the mid-way between them and Coryra, make them able to furnish all Peloponnesus, and waste it at their pleasure. The news of these doings at Pylus drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haste out of Attica, which they had entered a few days before with their whole Army: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Navy to recover this piece, which how bad a neighbour it might prove in time, they well foresaw, little fearing the grievous loss at hand, which they there in a few days received. For when they in vain made a general assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land, finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence; they occupied the haven, placing four hundred and twenty choice men, all of them Citizens of Sparta, in the Island before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channel that leads into the Port; but so narrow, that only two ships in front could enter between the Isle and Pylus; likewise but seven or eight ships could enter at once by the further channel between the Island and the Main. Having thus taken order to shut up this new Town by Sea, they sent part of their Fleet to fetch wood, and other stuff, wherewith to fortify round about, and block up the piece on all sides. But in the mean season the Athenian Fleet hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entering the Haven, did break and sink many of their enemies vessels; took five, and so enforced the residue to sue themselves aground.

Now was the Town secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Island as good as lost. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the Camp (as was their custom in great dangers) to advise what were best for the public safety; who when they did perceive that there was no other way to refuse their Citizens out of the Isle, than by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking Truce in the mean while with the Captains at Pylus. The conditions of the Truce were, That the Lacedæmonians should deliver up all the ships which were in the Coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the Town, nor the Athenians against the Camp: That a certain quantity of Bread, Wine, Flesh, should be daily carried into the Isle, but that no ships should pass into the Island secretly:

That the Athenians should carry the Lacedæmonian Embassadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and should bring them back, at the whole return the Truce should end; which if in the mean time it were broken in any one point, should be held utterly void in all: That when the Truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships in as good case as they received them. The Embassadors coming to Athens, were of opinion, That as they themselves had begun the War, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedæmonians did sue to them for peace, advising them to make an end of War, whilst with such reputation they might. But they found all contrary to their expectation: For instead of concluding upon even terms, or desiring of meet recompence for loss sustained, the Athenians demanded certain Cities to be restored to them, which had been taken from them by the Lacedæmonians long before this War began, refusing likewise to continue the treaty of peace, unless the Spartans which were in the Isle, were first rendered unto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect; at which time the Truce being ended, it was desired from the Athenian Captains, that they should according to their Covenant restore the ships which had been put in to their hands. Whereunto answer was made, that the condition of the Truce was, That if any one Article were broken, all should be held void; now (said the Athenians) ye have assaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are ye acquitted of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but meer shifts; yet profit so far overweighed honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedæmonians driven to use many hard means for conveyance of victuals into the Isle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed, That when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, these Prisoners should all be slain. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell upon them, the Lacedæmonians were so far from waiving Attica, that they suffered their own Country to be continually over-run, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their Coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendezvous of all that were ill-affected unto them.

SECT. V.

How the Lacedæmonians hardly, and to their great disadvantage obtained a Peace that was not well kept.

Therefore they endeavoured greatly to obtain peace; which the Athenians would not hearken unto. For they were so puffed up with continuance of good success, that having sent a few bands of men into Sicily to hold up a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrel; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Isle were taken away, and their lands returned without either gain or loss, they banished the Captains, as if it had been merely through their default that the Isle of Sicily was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it self, no whit inferior

our unto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their over-weening much abated shortly after by some disasters received, especially in Thrace, where in a battle which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon and Brasidas, Generals of the Athenian and Lacedæmonian forces, were both slain; which two had most been adversaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation, so the Lacedæmonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Navy which they had received at Pylus, were fain to proceed lamely in the War against such as through commodity of their good fleet, had all advantage that could be found in expedition, were fervently desirous to conclude the business ere Fortune by any new favour should revive the insolence which was at this time well fortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a consideration of their present estate, that urged them to bring the treaty of peace to a good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging over their heads, and ready to fall on them, which unless they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to avoid. The estate of Argos which had ancient enmity with them, was now after a Truce of thirty years well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles by joining with those who alone found them work enough. Argos was a rich and strong City, which though inferior to Sparta in valour, yet was not so unwelcome, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedæmonians could ever far prevail upon it, when they had little else to do.

This was a thing that in the beginning of this War had been not regarded. For it was then thought that by waiving the Territory of Athens with sword and fire, the quarrel should easily and in short time have been ended, whereby not only the Athenians should have been brought to good order, but the Corinthians and others, for whose sake the War was undertaken, have been so firmly knit to the Lacedæmonians, that they should for love of them have abandoned the Argives to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready money, and means to raise more, were able to secure themselves by a strong Fleet, from any great harm that the Peloponnesians, wanting wherewith to maintain a Navy, could do unto them; yea, as Masters of the Sea, they weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta they could now endure neither War nor peace; their daily travels, and many losses had wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians were glad to use the occasion which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a final peace, which with much ado they procured, as seemed equal and easy; but was indeed impossible to be performed, and therefore all their travel was little effectual.

The restitution of Prisoners and places taken being agreed upon, it fell out by lot that the Lacedæmonians should restore first. These had won more Towns upon the Continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had they were had not won absolutely: For they had restored some Towns to such of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; some, and those the most, they had set at liberty (as reason required) which had opened their gates unto them as to their friends and deliverers, and not compelled them to break in as enemies. Now concerning the Towns which were not in their own hands, but had been rendered unto their Confederates, the Spartans found means to give some satisfaction by permitting the Athenians to retain others which they had gotten in the War; as for the rest, they promised more than afterwards they could perform. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to hear of being abandoned, neither would they by any means yield themselves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by revolting, notwithstanding whatever Articles were drawn and concluded for their security and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing those things which on their part were required; so that restoring only the prisoners which they had, they deferred the rest until such time as they might receive the full satisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrel, the Lacedæmonians entered into a more straight alliance with the Athenians, making a league offensive and defensive with them. Hereunto they were moved by the backwardness of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to have sued for peace at their hands, as soon as things were once compounded between Athens and Sparta, did they themselves plainly unwilling to give ear to any such motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian succour, they should make sure work, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound unto them by well-deserving in the late War, or found so troublesome, that their enmity (if perhaps they durst let it appear) was little worse than friendship. It bred great jealousies in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive such a conjunction between two so powerful Signories; especially one claiming a threatening every one, that was anything apt to fear, with a secret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits of subduing the whole Country, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For besides the other Articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutual consent add new conditions, or alter the old at their own pleasures. This impression wrought so strongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had born to the Athenians their professed enemies, was violently thrown upon the Lacedæmonians their unjust friends: whereby it came to pass, that they who lately had born chief sway in Greece, might have been abandoned to the discretion of their enemies, as already in effect they were, had the enemies wisely used the advantage.

SECT. VI.

Of the Negotiations and practices held between many states of Greece, by occasion of the Peace that was concluded.

The admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as unrefusable, and able to make way through all impediments, had been to excessive, that when by some sinister accidents that City was compelled to take and seek peace upon terms not founding very honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens usually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was never thought that any Lacedæmonians

Ionians would have endured to lay down his weapons, and yield himself prisoner, nor that any misfortune should have been to great as should have drawn that City to relieve it less otherwise than by force of Arms. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especial mark, being overladen by enemies in the Island before Pylus, had rather chosen to live in captivity than to die in fight; and that Pylus had fired sticking as a thorn in the foot of Lacedæmonia, had bred such anguish in that Estate as utterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it fit down and sick to refresh it self by dishonourable ease: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceive bally of those men which were virtuous though unfortunate; but other less Cities joining with these in the same opinion, did cast their eyes upon the rich and great City of Argos, of whose ability to do much, they conceived a strong belief, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the bale condition which through foolish envy is become almost natural in the greater part of mankind. We curiously search into their vices, in whom had they kept some distance, we should have discerned only the virtues; and comparing injuriously our best parts with their worst, are justly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting in our selves.

The first that publish'd their dislike of Sparta, were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moved rather by envy at the greatness of Atheni daily enervating the Lacedæmonians had entered into the present War. But their Corinthians did only murmur at the peace, alleging as grievances that some Towns of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans who during the time of War, had procured some part of the Argadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependency upon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discover themselves; fear of revenge to come, working more effectually than indignation at things already past. The Argives feeling the gale of prosperous fortune that began to fill their sails, prepared themselves to take as much of it as they could stand under; giving for that purpose unto twelve of their Citizens a full and absolute commission to make alliance between them and any free Cities of Greece (Atheni and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding every particular business to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all comers; the Athenians began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesus following them, entered into this new Confederacy; some incited by private respects, others thinking it the wisest way to do as the most did. What inconvenience might arise unto them by these courses, the Lacedæmonians easily discerned; and therefore sent Embassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischief had been hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a gravity expressing the opinion which they had conceived of their present advantage over Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entered yet into alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gave audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purpose of whose Embassy was this: That the Corinthians without breach of their Oath could not forsake the alliance which they had long since made with Sparta; and that Reason did as well bind them to hold themselves contented with the peace lately made, as Religion enforced them to continue in their ancient Confederacy; forasmuch as it had been agreed between the Spartans and their Associates, that the consent of the greater part (which had yielded unto peace with Atheni) should bind the lesser number to perform what was concluded; if no divine impediment withhold them. Hereunto the Corinthians made answer, That the Spartans had first begun to do them open wrong, concluding the War wherein they had lost many places without provision of restitution; and that the very clause alleged by the Embassadors did acquit them from any necessity of subscribing to the late Peace, forasmuch as they had sworn unto those people whom they perswaded to rebel against Atheni, that they would never abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall again into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in Reason and Religion to use all means of upholding those whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an Oath was no less to be accounted a Divine impediment, than perfidy, tempest, or any the like accident, hindering the performance of things undertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they said, That they would do as they should find cause. Having dismissed the Embassadors with this answer, they made haste to join themselves with Argos, and caused other States to do the like; so that Sparta and Atheni were in a manner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also upon the point to have entered into this new Confederacy. But as the affections were divers which caused this hasty conclusion of sudden friends to Argos, it is likewise cause to pass that the friendship it self, such as it was, had much diversity both of sincerity and of continuance. For some there were, that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians, as the Mantineans and Elans; these did firmly betake themselves to the Argives, in whom they knew the same affection to be inveterate: others did only hate the peace concluded; and these would rather have followed the Spartans than the Argives in War, yet rather the Argives in War than the Lacedæmonians in peace. Of this number were to enter into the society of the Argives as they had done; but the different forms of Government used in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principal men, than to incur the danger of innovation, by joining with such as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This business having ill succeeded, the Corinthians began to bethink themselves of their own danger, who had not so much as any True with Atheni, and yet were unprepared for War. They sought therefore to come to some temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one City, that had shewed against them, more stomach than force; but gave them to understand, that they might be safe enough from them if they would claim the benefit of that alliance which Atheni had lately made with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally they granted unto these Corinthians (which were loth to acknowledge themselves dependant of Sparta) the True that they desired; but into private Confederacy they would not admit them, being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor war without the other.

Herein,

Herein, as in many other passages, may clearly be seen the great advantage which absolute Lords have, as well in peace as in war, over such as are served by Volunteers. We shall hardly find any Signiory that hath been so constantly followed as Sparta was by so many States, and some of them little inferior to it self, being all as free: whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsion means gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselves as Tyrants. But in performance of conditions agreed upon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacy, and giving up such places as were agreed upon: of which the Lacedæmonians could do neither the one nor the other. For such Towns as were old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be reformed without their consent which had them in present possession; and particularly the Town of Panactis which the Thebans held, could by no means be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (who earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof unto the Athenians as earnestly demanding it, themselves might recover Pylus) unless that they would agree to make a private alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were constrained to do, though knowing it to be contrary to the last agreement between them and Atheni.

The Lacedæmonians having broken one article of the league made between them and the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not give up the Town of Panactis, till first they had utterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was fought to have been excused by the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, who coming to Atheni (whither they had sent home all prisoners that had been detained at Thebes) hoping with gentle words to lull the matter; saying, That from henceforth no enemy of Atheni should nestle in Panactis, for it was destroyed. But these Embassadors had not to deal with tame fools. For the Athenians told them in plain terms, That of three principal conditions agreed upon in their late League, they had not performed any one; but used such base confusions as stood not with their honour: having made private alliance with the Thebans; having destroyed a Town that they should have restored; and not having forced their dependants by War, to make good the Covenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough words, meaning with as rough needs to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time both in Atheni and Sparta, many that were ill contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that year in Sparta; and Alcibiades, a powerful young Gentleman in Atheni. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the War, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendered to them by Covenant, especially Pylus that had so sorely troubled them. Alcibiades, whose Nobility, riches and favour with the people, made him desire War, as the mean whereby himself might procure some honourable employment, used all means to stir the quarrel on foot, whilst the Athenians had yet both advantage enough, as not having rendered ought save their prisoners, and pretence enough to use that advantage of breaking the peace, by reason that the Lacedæmonians (though indeed against their wills) had broken all Covenants with them. Now the State of Atheni had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to perform nothing that the Lacedæmonians should, and might require, until they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all Articles whereto they were bound, even to the utmost point. This was enough to make them froward, who having already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the delivery of their Citizens which were prisoners. But Alcibiades wishing a speedy beginning of open War, sent privily to the Argives, and gave them to understand how fitly the time served for them to associate themselves with Atheni, which was enough to give them security against all enemies.

The Argives upon the first concurrence of many Estates unto their society, had conceived great hopes of working wonders, as if they should have had the conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as having ill used it, and thereby leaving their old enemies in case of much contempt and disability. But these sudden apprehensions of vain joy, were suddenly changed into as vain fear; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately been conceived of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance; when the Corinthians had sought security from Atheni; and when a false rumour was noised abroad, Atheni, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full agreement upon all points of difference; than began the Argives to let fall their crests, and sue for peace unto the Lacedæmonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their gravity, and were not over-hasty to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the message of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argives, which were not now consulting how to become the chief of all others, but how to save themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to Atheni their own Embassadors, accompanied with the Mantineans and Elans, to make a League offensive and defensive between their Estates and the Athenians.

Of this business, the Lacedæmonians knew not what to think: for well they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to prevent it; but to keep the love of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done than stood with their honour or profit; others held it the wisest way, having done so much, not to stick upon a little more, but rather by giving full satisfaction to retain the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued than all the rest of Greece. This resolution prevailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who coming to Atheni with full commission to make an end of all Controversies, did earnestly labour in the Council-house, to make the truth of things appear; saying, That their Confederacy with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recovery of Panactis: concerning which Town, or any other business, that it much grieved the Lacedæmonians to see things fall out in such wise as might give to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters even between them, to which purpose they shewed that themselves had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might be restored to them, and especially for the present, that the Negotiation with the Argives might be called off. Favourable audience was given to this proposition, the rather because they which promised amends, had power to make their words good. But all this fair likelihood of good agreement was

dait on the sudden, by the practice of Alcibiades, who secretly dealing with the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, persuaded them well of his friendship towards their City, and advised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be known to the Commonalty of Athens, lest the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptory and yield to nothing, unless they could draw them to unreasonable conditions. The Embassadors believed him, and fashioned their tale in the assembly of the people as he had advised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the advantage which their double dealing afforded, inveighed openly against them, as men of no sincerity; that were come to Athens for no other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthening themselves with friends, meaning to draw the Argives and their Adherents to their own alliance, as (contrary to their own Oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, whom a pleasing errand would very hardly have satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedæmonians, (whose honest meanings had to ill been seconded with good performance) were now so much incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadors, and the strong persuasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the League with Argos. Yet for the present so far did Nicias an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, prevail with them, that the business was put off, until he himself with other Embassadors might fetch a better answer from Sparta.

It may also seem a great wonder, how so poor a trick of Alcibiades was able to carry a matter of so great importance, when the Spartan Embassadors might have cast the load upon his own shoulders, by discovering the truth: But the gravity which was usually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindered them (perhaps) from playing their game handsomely against so nimble a wit; and they might well have been thought untruly men, had they professed themselves such as would lay and unlay for their most advantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a frowne message to deliver at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, That the Lacedæmonians should take the pains to rebuild Sanctæ, and should immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thebans; letting them understand, that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into Confederacy with the Argives, and their adherents. The Ephor at Sparta had no mind to forsake the Thebans, assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was suffered to break out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would do no more than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not seem to have effected nothing) swear anew to keep the Articles of the league between them and Athens. Immediately therefore upon return of the Embassadors, a new League was made between the Athenians, Argives, Maininians, and Eleants, with very ample provision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were passed over with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this Confederacy did bend it self chiefly against them, as in short while after was proved by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill case, who having restored all that they could unto the Athenians, and procured others to do the like, Sicily, had themselves recovered nothing of their own (prisoners excepted), for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disturb them, was the loss of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late War by misfortunes, than in sundry passages between them and the Athenians: to procure and keep whole Amity, they had left sundry of their own friends to shift for themselves. Contrariwise, the Athenians by the treaty of peace had recovered the most part of that which they lost in War; all their gettings they had retained; and were strengthened by the access of new Confederates.

SECT. VII.

How the Peace between Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

It was not long ere the Argives and their fellows had found business wherewith to let the Athenians on work, and make use of this conjunction. For presuming upon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So many acts of hostility were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did (as principals) inflict each the others, but came in collaterally, as to the aid of their several friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Bœotians, Phocians, Locrisians, and other people of Greece began anew to range themselves under the Lacedæmonians, and follow their Ensigns. One victory which the Lacedæmonians obtained by their meet valor in a fat Battle near to Mainina, against the Argive side, helped well to repair their decayed reputation, though otherwise it yielded them no great profit. The civil dissension arising shortly after within Argos it self, between the principal Citizens, and the Commons, had almost thrown down the whole frame of the new combination. For the chief Citizens getting the upper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so far, as to renounce the Amity of the Athenians in express words, and forced the Maininians to the like. But in short space of time the multitude prevailing, reversed all this, and having chased away their ambitious Nobility, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as before.

Besides their upstarts in Poloponnesus, many assays were made to raise up troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Macædon to the Athenians: whose forces and readiness for execution prevented some things, revenged other, and required all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians warring matter of quarrel, and the Lacedæmonians growing weary, they began to be quiet; retaining still that enmity in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discovered in effects, though not yet breaking out into terms of open War.

SECT. VIII.

The Athenians sending two Fleets to sack Syracuse, are put to flight, and utterly distressed.

During this intermission of open War, the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of subduing Sicily, whither they sent a Fleet to mighty, as never of the History of the War.

ver was set forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This Fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all necessities to so great an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades, Author of that Voyage, and one of the Generals of their Fleet, was driven to banish himself, for fear of such judgment as else he was like to have undergone among the incensed people; partly by the invasion which the Lacedæmonians made upon Attica, whilst the forces of that State were so far from home. Hereunto was added the aid of the King of Perfia, who supplied the Poloponnesians with money.

Neither was the success of things in Sicilia such, as without help from Athens, could give any likelihood of a good end to that War. For although in the beginning, the enterprize had so well succeeded, that they besieged Syracuse, the chief City of all the Island, and one of the fairest Towns which the Greeks inhabited, obtaining the better in sundry Battels by Land and Sea; yet when the Town was relieved with strong aid from Poloponnesus, it came to pass that the Athenians were put to the work on all sides, in such wise, that their Fleet was shut up into the Haven of Syracuse, and could not issue out.

As the Athenian affairs went very ill in Sicily, so did they at home stand upon their terms; for that the Lacedæmonians, who had been formerly accustomed to make wearisome yearly journeys into Attica, which having pillaged and foraged, they returned home; did now by counsel of Alcibiades (who seeking revenge upon his own Citizens, was fled unto them) fortify the Town of Decelea, which was near to Athens, whence they could not without daily incursions to harry all the Country round about, and sometimes give alarm unto the City it self. In these extremities the perverse obstinacy of the Athenians was very strange; who leaving at their backs, and at their own doors, an enemy little less mighty than themselves, did yet send forth another Fleet into Sicily, to invade a people no less puissant, which had never offended them.

It often happens, that a prosperous event, makes foolish counsel seem wiser than it was; which came to pass many times among the Athenians, whose vain Conceits Pallas was laid to turn to the best. But where unadvised finding bad proof, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be justly blamed for a miserable issue. This second Fleet of the Athenians, which better might have served to convey home the former that was defeated, after some attempts made to small purpose against the Syracusians, was finally (together with the other part of the Navy, which was there before) quite vanquished, and heaved up into the Haven of Syracuse, whereby the Camp of the Athenians, utterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driven to break up, and fly away by Land; in which flight they were overtaken, routed, and quite overthrowen, in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischief well deserved, fell upon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophocles and Philostratus Generals, formerly sent into that life, pretending that they had taken money for making peace in Sicily, whereas indeed there was not any means or possibility to have made War. Hereby it came to pass, that Nicias who had the chief command in this unhappy enterprize, did rather chuse to hazard the ruin of his Country by the loss of that Army, wherein consisted little less than all the power of Athens; than to adventure his own office, his life, and his honour, upon the tongues of shameful accusers, and the sentence of Judges before his trial resolved to condemn him, by retiring from Syracuse, when wisdom and necessity required it. For (said he) they shall give sentence upon us, who know not the reason of our doings, nor would give ear to any that would speak in our behalf, but altogether hearken to suspicious and vain rumours, that shall be brought against us: yea these our soldiers, who now are so desirous to return in safety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the loud and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man to do what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth; and to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report and censure of others) yet it may be excused; since he had before his eyes the injustice of his people, and had well understood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact, as being held a precedent and pattern whereby oppression beginning upon one, is extended as warrantable upon all. Therefore his fear of wrongful condemnation was such as a constant man could not easily have overmastered; but when afterwards the Army, having no other expectation of safety than the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moon, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to have the Camp break up till seven and twenty days were past. His timorousness was even as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not have thought that the powers of the Heavens, and the course of Nature would be as unjust as his Athenians; or might portend less evil to the foolish, than to such as did their best. Neither do I think that any Astrologers can allude this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armes destruction, otherwise than as the folly of men did, by application, turn it to their own confusion. Had Cælius the Roman, he who slew Julius Cæsar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, he retiring, the broken remainder of Cælius his Army, defeated by the Parthian Archers, was advised, upon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sun were past the sign of Scorpio; he made answer, That he stood not in such fear of Scorpio as of Sagittarius. So adventuring rather to abide the frowning of the Heavens, than the nearer danger of Enemies upon Earth, he made such a safe and honourable retreat, as did both shew his noble resolution, and give a fair example to that good rule, —Sapiens Dominabitur astris.

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily works by a concatenation of means, deprives the Governors of understanding, when he intends evil to the Multitude; and that the wickedness of unjust men is the ready mean to weaken the virtue of those who might have done them good.

SECT. IX.

Of the troubles whereinto the State of Athens fell, after the great loss of the Fleet and Army in Sicilia.

THE loss of this Army was the ruin of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accounted a very little less calamity to that Estate, than was the subversion of the Walls, when the City about seven years after was taken by Lysander. For now began the subjects of the Athenian Estate to rebel: of whom, some they reduced under their obedience, others held out; some for fear of greater inconvenience were set at liberty, promising only to be their good friends, as formerly they had been their Subjects; others having a kind of liberty offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect liberty by force. Among these troubles it fell out very unfortunately, that the principal men of Athens, being wearied with the peoples infidelity, took upon them to change the form of that Estate, and bring the Government into the hands of a few. To which purpose, conspiring with the Captains which were abroad, they caused them to set up the form of an Aristocracy in the Towns of their Confederates; and in the mean time, some that were most likely to withstand this Innovation, being slain at Athens, the Commonalty were so dismayed, that none durst speak against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but every man was afraid of his neighbour, lest he should be a member of the league. In this general fear the Majesty of Athens was usurped by four hundred men, who observing in shew the ancient form of proceedings, did cause all matters to be propounded unto the people, and concluded upon by the greater part of voices; but the things propounded were only such as were first allowed in private among themselves; neither had the Commonalty any other liberty, than only to approve and give consent: for whosoever presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no enquiry made of the murder. By these means were many Decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new authority, which nevertheless endured not long: For the Fleet and Army which then was in the Isle of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the four hundred Ultrapers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they revoked Alcibiades out of Banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised to the Lacedæmonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant made unprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first been very well entertained in Sparta, whilst his service done unto that State was not grown to be the object of envy. But when it appeared that in Council and good performance he so far excelled all the Lacedæmonians, that all their good success was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principal Citizens weary of his virtue; especially Agis one of their Kings, whose Wife had so far yielded herself to the love of this Athenian, that among her inward friends he could not forbear to call her young child by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discovering the Spartan treachery, conveyed himself unto Tissaphernes, whom he loved with his great beauty, sweet conversation, and found wit, that he soon became the Master of that barbarous Viceroy's affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings Treasures and Forces in those parts. Then began he to advise Tissaphernes, not so far forth to assist the Lacedæmonians, that they should quite overthrow the State of Athens, but rather to help the weaker side, and let them one consume another, wherby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persians. By this counsel he made way to other practices, wherewith by strength of his reputation (as the only favourite of so great a Potentate) he played his own game, procuring his restitution. At length his Banishment being repealed by the Army, but not by the Citizens (who then were opposed by the four hundred) he laboured greatly to reconcile the Soldiers to the Governours; or at least to divert their heat another way, and turn it upon the common Enemy. Some of the four hundred approved his motion, as being weary of the tyranny wherewith they were partakers, partly because they saw it could not long endure, and partly for that themselves, being less regarded by the rest of their companions, than stood with their good liking, sought to acquire themselves of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtain peace of the Lacedæmonians, desiring chiefly to maintain both their own authority, and the greatness of their City, if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preserve their own power, or safety at least, than the good Estate of the Commonwealth. Therefore they made sundry overtures of peace to the Lacedæmonians, desiring to compound in as good terms as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be trusted than the wavering multitude; especially considering that the City of Sparta was governed by an Aristocracy, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All these passages between the four hundred (or the most and chief of them) and the Lacedæmonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the City of Athens, hoping without any great cause to repair their losses, was not inclined to make composition; from which upon just ground the Enemy was much more averse, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not unknown abroad) might yield some fair opportunity to the destruction of it self, which in effect (though not then presently) came to pass. And upon this hope King Agis did sometimes bring his forces from Decelia to Athens, where doing no good, he received some small losses. Likewise the Navy of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the City, but seeing no likelihood of success, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained Victories, which in the better fortune of the Athenians might more lightly have been regarded, than in this they decayed estate. Yet it seems, without any disparagement to their wisdom, they should rather have forborn to present unto the City, or to the Country near adjoining, any terror of the War. For the dissolution within the walls might soon have done more good than could be received from the Fleet or Army without, which indeed gave occasion to let the Citizens at unity, though it lasted not very long. The four hundred by means of these troubles, were fain to resign their authority, which they could not now hold; when the people, having taken arms to repell foreign Enemies, would not lay them down, till they had freed themselves from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of Government a full restitution of the sovereign command unto the people, or or whole body of the City, but only to five thousand; which company the four hundred (when their authority began) had pretended to take unto them as assistants: herein seeming to do little wrong or none to the Commonalty, who seldom assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeed into the hands of so many, it was soon agreed, that Alcibiades and his companions should be recalled from exile, and that the Army at Samos should be requested to undertake the Government: which was forthwith reformed according to the Soldiers desire.

SECT. X.

How Alcibiades won many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile; made their General, and again deposed.

THIS establishment of things in the City, was accompanied with some good success in the Wars. For the Lacedæmonians were about the same time overthrowen at Sea in a great battel by the Athenian Fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards joining such forces as he could raise, obtained many Victories. Before the Town of Abydos, his arrival with eighteen ships, gave the honour of a great Battel to the Athenians; he overthrowen and utterly destroyed the Fleet of the Lacedæmonians commanded by Mindarus; took the Towns of Cyzicus and Perinthus, made the Selymbrian ransom their City, and fortified Chrysopolis. Hereupon Letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians interpreting, found to contain the distress of the Army in these few words: All is lost; Mindarus is slain; the Soldiers want victuals; we know not what to do.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades overthrowen the Lacedæmonians in fight by Land at Chalcedon, took Selymbria, besieged and won Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which even in those days was a goodly, rich, and very strong City. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made High Admiral of all the Navy.

But this his honour continued not long, for it was taken from him, and he driven to banish himself again, only because his Lieutenant contrary to the express command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the Fleet.

The second Banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmful than the first; and the loss which thereupon they received, was (though more heavy to them, yet) less to be pitied of others, than that which ensued upon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had fought revenge upon his own City; now as inured to adversity he rather pitied their fury, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should have repaired their weak estate, than fought by procuring or beholding the calamity of his people, to comfort himself after injury received. Before they who were inflamed in the place of Alcibiades, arrived at the Fleet, he presented Battel to Lysander the Lacedæmonian Admiral, who was not so confident upon his former Victory, as to undertake Alcibiades himself, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former loss of fifteen) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had been under his Lieutenant. But when the Decree of the people was published in the Navy, then did Alcibiades withdraw himself to a Town upon the Hellepont, called Byzantium, where he had built a Castle.

SECT. XI.

The Battel of Arginusæ, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captains by the People.

AFTER this time the Athenians receiving many losses and discomfures, were driven to fly into the Haven of Amyclene, where they were straitly besieged both by Land and Sea. The raising of this siege necessity enforced them to man all their Vessels, and to put the utmost of their forces into the hazard of one Battel. This Battel was fought at Arginusæ, where Callicratides Admiral of the Lacedæmonians, losing the honour of the day, preserved his own reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well have been expected that the ten Captains, who jointly had command in chief over the Athenian Fleet, should for that good days service, and so happy a Victory, have received great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise, they were forthwith called home and accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunk, to be cast away, when by appointing more Vessels to take them up, they might have saved them from being drowned. Hereto the Captains readily made a very just answer, That they pursuing the Victory, had left part of the Fleet under sufficient men, to save those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindered the performance of that, and other their intentions. This excuse availed not. For a leud fellow was brought forth, who said, That he himself creaking in a Meat-tub, had been intreated by those who were in peril of drowning, to desire of the people revenge of their deaths upon the Captains. It was very strange that upon such an accusation maintained with so slender evidence, men that had well deserved of their Country should be overthrowen. But their enemies had so incensed the rabal multitude, that no man durst absolve them, save only Socrates the wise and virtuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgment was not regarded. Six of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much ado relieved by other Vessels in the storm: but the Captains which were absent escaped; for when the fury of the people was over-past, this judgment was reversed, and the accusers called into question for having deceived and perverted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamy of injustice, but the Divine Justice was not asleep, nor would be so deluded.

SECT. XII.

The Battel at Egos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian War.

THE Peloponnesian Fleet under Lysander, the year next following, having scourged the Egean Seas, enter Hellepont, where (landing Soldiers)

ers) it besieged and took the Town of Lampfacus, whereupon the Navy of Athens, being an hundred and fourscore sail, made thither in haste: but finding Lampfacus taken before their coming, they put in at Sesfos, where having refreshed themselves, they sailed to the River called Agos-Panamos, which is (as we might name it) Goats-Brook, or the River of the Goat, being on the Continent opposite to Lampfacus: and there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lampfacus in the Harbor. The next day after their arrival, they presented fight unto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned again to Agos-Panamos; and thus they continued five days, braving every day the Enemy, and returning to their own Harbor when it drew towards Evening.

The Castle of Alcibiades was not far from the Navy, and his power in those places was such as might have greatly availed his Country-men, if they could have made use of it. For he had waged Mercenaries, and making War in his own name upon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much reputation among them. He perceiving the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired unto them, and shewed what great inconvenience might grow, if they did not soon foresee and prevent it. For they lay in a rude subject to every weather, neither near enough to any Town where they might furnish themselves with necessaries, nor so far off as had been more expedient. Sesfos was the next Market-Town; thither both Soldiers and Mariners resorted, flocking away from the Navy every day, as soon as they were returned from braving the Enemy. Therefore Alcibiades wished them either to lie at Sesfos, which was not far off, or at least to consider how near their Enemy was, while fear proceeded rather from obedience to their General, than from any cowardice. This admonition was so far despised, that some of the Commanders would him to meddle with his own matters, and to remember that his authority was out of date. Had it not been for these opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) have compelled the Lacedæmonians either to fight upon unequal terms, or utterly to quit their Flight. And like enough it was that he might so have done by transporting the light-armed Thracians, his Confederates, and others his followers, over the Straights, who assaulting the Peloponnesians by Land, would either have compelled them to put to sea, or else to leave their ships to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsel no better than hath been rehearsed, he left them to their fortune; which how evil it would be, he did not prognosticate.

Lysander all this while defending himself by the advantage of his Haven, was not careless in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was, to send forth some of his swiftest Vessels after them, who observing their doings, related unto him what they had seen. Therefore understanding in what careless fashion they roomed up and down the Country; he kept all his men aboard after their departure: and the fifth day gave especial charge to his Scouts, that when they perceived the Athenians disembarking, as their custom was, and walking towards Sesfos, they should forthwith return, and hang up a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

der being in a readiness, made all speed that strength of Oars could give, to Agos-Panamos, where he found very few of his enemies aboard their ships, nor many near them, and all in great confusion upon the news of his approach.

Inasmuch that the greatest industry which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that loss imported, gave over Athens as desperate, and made a long flight into the Isle of Cyprus; all the rest were taken, and such of the Soldiers as came into the rescue, cut in pieces. Thus was the War which had lasted seven and twenty years, with variable success, concluded in one hour, and the glory of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that the never afterward shone in her perfect light.

Immediately upon this Victory Lysander having taken such Towns as readily did yield upon the first fame of his exploits, set sail for Athens, and joining his forces with those of Agis and Pausanias Kings of Sparta, summoned the City, which finding too stubborn to yield, and too strong to be won on the sudden, he put forth again to Sea, and rather by terror than violence, compelled all the Islands, and such Towns of the Ionians as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselves to Sparta; he did thereby cut off all provision of victuals, and other necessities from the City, and enforced the people by meer Famine to yield to these conditions: That the long Walls leading from the Town to the Port, should be thrown down; That all Cities subject to their Estate, should be set at liberty: That the Athenians should be Masters only of their own Territories, and the fields adjoining to their Town; And that they should keep no more than twelve ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same whom the Lacedæmonians did, and follow the Lacedæmonians as Leaders in the Wars.

These Articles being agreed upon, the Walls were thrown down with great rejoicing of those who had born displeasure to Athens; and not without some consultation of destroying the City, and laying waste the land about it. Which advice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirty Governors, or rather cruel Tyrants, appointed over the people, who recompensed their former insolency and injustice over their Captives, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable slavery.

The only small hope then remaining to the Athenians was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repair what their own folly had ruined. But the Thirty Tyrants perceiving this, advertised the Lacedæmonians thereof, who contrived, and (as now) domineered in every quarter) soon effected his sudden death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian War. After which the Lacedæmonians, abusing the reputation and great power which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to Greece, and by combination of many Cities against them, were dissolved; of which they had subdued Athens. The greatest foil that they took, was of the Thebans led by Epinomidas, under whom Philip of Macedon Father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his Education. By these Thebans the City of Sparta (besides other great losses received) was sundry times in danger of being taken. But their haughty attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the several Estates and Signories of Greece, were grown so jealous one of another, that the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, Argives, and Thebans, Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselves with the weaker party, did to counterpoize the stronger, that no one City could extend the limits of her jurisdiction so far as might make her terrible to her neighbours. And thus all parts of the Country remained rather evenly balanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon (whose forceful they had been dependants and followers, yealously most near Vassals to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found means by making use of their factions, to bring them all into servitude, from which they never could be free, till the Romans presenting them with a shew of liberty, did themselves indeed become their Masters.

CHAP. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnesian War, or shortly following it.

SECT. I.

How the affairs of Persia stood in those times.

During the times of this Peloponnesian War, and those other less Expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimannus having peaceably enjoyed a long reign over the Persians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greek Historians (lightly passing over Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as Usurpers, and for their short reign little to be regarded) place next unto them, or to Xerxes the second; who as his Brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to have been the Sons of Hesper) held the Kingdom but one year between them, the younger succeeding his elder Brother. It is not my purpose (as I have said before) to pursue the History of the Persians from henceforth, by rehearsal of all the particulars, otherwise than as they shall be incident to the affairs of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That Xerxes the second being a vicious Prince, did perish after a month or two, if not by surfeit, then by the treachery of his riotous Brother Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his Brother, and more cruel, he slew unjustly Bagoas a principal Eunuch, and would have done as much to his Brother Darius the Bastard, had not he foreseen it, and by raising a stronger Army than this hated King Sogdianus could levy, fought at once upon the King and Kingdom. Darius having slain his Brother, held the Empire nineteen years. Amoratus of Sais an Egyptian, rebelled against him, and having partly slain, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrison, allied himself firmly with the Greeks, that by their aid he maintained the Kingdom, and delivered it over to his posterity, who (notwithstanding the fury of their civil Wars) maintained it against the Persians all the days of this Darius, and of his Son Artaxerxes Mucron. Likewise Amorges a subject of his own, and of the Royal blood, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himself with the Athenians. But the great calamity before spoken of, which fell upon the Athenians in Sicily, having put new life into the Spartans, and given courage to the Islanders and others, subject to the State of Athens, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage; It fell out well for Darius that the Lacedæmonians being destitute of money, wherewith to defray the charge of a great

Navy, without which it was impossible to advance the War against the State of Athens, that remained powerful by Sea, were driven to crave his assistance, which he granted unto them, first upon what conditions best pleased himself, though afterwards the Articles of the League between him and them, were let down in more precise terms; wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make War jointly upon the Athenians, and upon all that should rebel from either of them; and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia which had formerly been his, or his Predecessors, should return to his obedience. By this Treaty, and the War ensuing (of which I have already spoken) he recovered all that his Grandfather and Father had lost in Asia. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedæmonians he got Amorges alive into his hands, who was taken in the City of Tasus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succour him. Nevertheless Egypt still held out against him, the cause whereof cannot be the employment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece: for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with Gold; which effected for him by Soldiers of other Nations, and his natural enemies, what the valour of his own Subjects was insufficient to perform. Darius had in marriage Parysatis his own Sister, who bare unto him (besides other Children) Artaxerxes called Monon, that is to say, the Mindful, or the Rememberer, who succeeded him in the Kingdom; and Cyrus the younger, a Prince of singular virtue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that ever Persia bred after Cyrus the great. But the old King Darius, intending to leave unto his eldest Son Artaxerxes the inheritance of the great Empire, did cast a jealous eye upon the doings of young Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, took more upon him than befitted a Subject: for which cause his Father sent for him, with intent to have taken some very sharp course with him, and had not his own death prevented the coming of his younger Son, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the War between these Brethren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, we shall have occasion to speak somewhat in more convenient place.

SECT.

SECT. II.

How the Thirty Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

I Hold it in this place very convenient to shew the proceedings of the Greeks, after the subversion of the Walls of Athens, which gave end to that War called the Peloponnesian War, but could not free the unhappy Country of Greece from civil broils. The thirty Governours, commonly called the thirty Tyrants of Athens, were chosen at the first by the people to compile a body of their Law, and make a collection of such ancient Statutes as were meet to be put in practice: the condition of the City standing as it did in that sudden alteration. To this charge was annexed the Supreme Authority, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessity of the times did so require it, wherein the Law being uncertain, it was fit that such men should give judgment in particular causes, to whose judgment the Laws themselves, by which the City was to be ordered, were become subject. But these Thirty having to great power in their hands, were more careful to hold it, than to deserve it by faithful execution of that which was committed to them in trust.

Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellows as were odious to the City, though not punishable therefore by Law; they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approved, who considered their leud conditions, but did not withal bethink themselves how easy a thing it would be unto these thirty men to take away the lives of Innocents, by calling them perturbors of the peace, or what else they listed, when condemnation without true trial and proof had been once well allowed. Having thus plausibly entered into a wicked course of Government, they thought it best to fortifie themselves with a sure guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needs commit for the establishing of their authority. Wherefore dispatching two of their own company to Sparta, they informed the Lacedemonians, that it was the full intent of the Thirty to keep the City free from all rebellious motions: to which purpose it behoved them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired the Lacedemonians to send them a Garrison, which they promised at their own costs to maintain. This motion was well approved, and a Guard sent, the Captain of which was so well entertain'd by the Thirty, that none of their misdeeds could want his high commendations of Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and looking no more after base and detested persons, invaded the principal men of the City, sending armed men from house to house, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely or able to make any head against this wicked form of Government: whereby there was such effusion of blood, as to Theramenes (one of the Thirty) seemed very horrible, and unable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discovered, caused his fellows to bethink themselves, and provide for their own security, and his destruction, lest he should make himself a Captain of the discontented (which were almost the whole City) and redeem his own peace with their ruin. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetest, and gave unto them some part of the publick Authority, the rest they disarm'd; and having thus increased their own strength, and weakened their opposites, they began afresh to shed the blood, not only of their private enemies, but of such whose money, or goods, might enrich them, and enable them for the payment of their Guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that every one of them should name one man, upon whose goods he should seize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes uttered his detestation of so wicked intent, then did Critias, who of all the Thirty was most tyrannical, accuse him to the Council, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one main priviledge of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the Thirty, but have the accustomed trial) he took upon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes, and so reduced him under the trial and sentence of that order. It was well alleaged by Theramenes that his name was not more easy to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans; upon which consideration, he advic'd them all to conceive no otherwise of his case than as of their own, who were liable to the same form of proceeding: but every man chusing rather to preserve his own life by silence, than presently to draw upon himself the danger, which as yet concern'd him little, and perhaps would never come near him; the Tyrants interpreting silence as consent, condemn'd him forthwith, and compelled him to drink poison.

SECT. III.

The Conspiracy against the thirty Tyrants, and their disposing.

AFTER the death of Theramenes, the Thirty began to use such out-rage as excell'd their former villanies. For having three thousand (as they thought) firm unto them, they robbed all others without fear or shame, depoling them of lands and goods, and caused them to fly into banishment, for safeguard of their lives. This flight of the Citizens procured their liberty, and the general good of the City. For the banished Citizens who were fled to Thebes, entered into consultation, and resolved to hazard their lives in setting free the City of Athens. The very thought of such a practice had been treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seventy men or thereabout, were the first undertakers, who with their Captain Therapylus took Phyle, a place of strength in the Territory of Athens. No sooner did the Thirty hear of their exploit, than seek means to prevent further danger; assembling the three thousand, and their Lacedemonian Guard, with which force they attempted Phyle, but were with some loss of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by means of snow that fell, and other stormy weather, against which they had not made provision. Retiring therefore to the City, which above all they were to make good, they left the most of their Guard, and two companies of Horle, to weary out them which lay in Phyle, with a flying siege. But it was not long ere the followers of Therapylus were increased from seventy to seven hundred, which adventured to give charge upon those Guards, of whom they cut off above above an hundred and twenty. These small but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyle, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piræus, the suburb of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their coming, the Thirty had resolved to fortifie the Town of Eleusine to their own use, whereinto they might make an easy retreat, and save themselves from any sudden peril. It may well seem strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of Government had brought them into such danger, they were so far from seeking to obtain men good will, that contrariwise to secure themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could bear arms into their hands by a train, and wickedly (though under form of Justice) murdered them all. But Sceleribus tutum per scelera est iter, the mischiefs which they had already done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparent likelihood of safety, than by extending their cruelty unto all, fearing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Therapylus and his fellows, who as yet were termed conspirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thousand armed again by the Tyrants, and brought to assault it; but in this enterprize Therapylus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom though there were slain to the number of seventy only, yet the Victory seemed the greater, because Critias, and one other of the Thirty, perished in that fight. The death of Critias, and the stout defence of Piræus, together with some exhortations used by Therapylus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the Thirty were depol'd. Nevertheless there were so many of the three thousand, who having communicated with the Thirty in their misdeeds, feared to be called to a sharp account, that no peace, nor quiet form of Government could be established. For Embas-sadors were sent to Sparta, who craving aid against Therapylus and his followers, had favourable audience, and a power sent to their assistance, both by land and sea, under the conduct of Lysander, and his Brother; whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Army of the Cities confederate with the Lacedemonians. And here appeared first the jealousy, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Bœotians and Corinthians, who in the late Wars had been the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alledging that it stood not with their caths, to make War against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the League: but fearing indeed lest the Lacedemonians should annex the Territory of Athens to their own Demains. It is not to be doubted, that Pausanias took this answer in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to cross the proceedings of Lysander, whom he envied. Therefore having in some small skirmishes against them of Therapylus his party, made a shew of War, he finally wrought such means that all things were compounded quietly: the thirty men, and such others as were like to give cause of tumults, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that Tyrannical faction, having withdrawn themselves to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some innovation; whereupon the whole City rising against them, took their Captains, as they were coming to Parley, and slew them: which done, to avoid further inconvenience, a law was made, that all injuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, and carefully observed, the City returned to her former quietness.

Of the Expedition of Cyrus the younger.

SECT. I.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempt against his brother.

THE matters of Greece standing upon such terms, that no one Estate durst oppose itself against that of Lacedamon: young Cyrus, Brother to Artaxerxes King of Persia, having in his Fathers life-time very carefully prosecuted the War against Athens, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their love might appear no less to him, than that which he had shewed towards them in their dangerous War against the Athenians. To this request, being general, the Lacedemonians gave a suitable answer; commanding the Admiral to perform unto Cyrus all service that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discovered himself, and the Lacedemonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the Kingdom of Persia should have been the recompence of his deserts; or that, he perishing in battel, as after he did, the subversion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God rather to shew unto the Greeks the ways, which under the Macedonian Ensigns, the victorious foot-steps of their posterity should measure; and opening unto them the riches, and wial the weakness of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that Conquest, which he reserved to another generation; than to give into their hands that mighty Kingdom, whose hour was not yet come. The love which Parsyatis the Queen-mother of Persia bare unto Cyrus her younger son, being seconded by the earnest favour of the people, and ready desires of many principal men, had moved this young Prince in his Fathers old age, to aspire after the Succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before been shewed) whose meaning was to curb this ambitious Youth; he found his elder brother Artaxerxes established so surely by the old Kings favour, that it were not safe to attempt any means of displanting him, by whose whole disavow himself might easily lose the place of a Viceroy, which he held in Asia the less, and hardly be able to maintain his own life. The nearest neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compassed of cowardice, treachery, craft, and all vices which accumulably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, using by the way all fair shews of friendship as to a Prince for whom it might well be thought that Queen Parysatis had obtained the inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true, that Parysatis had used the best of her endeavour to that purpose, alleging that (which in former ages had been much available to Xerxes, in the like dilection with his elder brother Artaxerxes was born whilst his Father was a private man, but Cyrus, when he was crowned King, All which not sufficing; when the most that could be obtained for Cyrus was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanor, and confinement of his place in Lydia, and the parts adjoining: then did this Tissaphernes discover his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous Treason intended against his person. Upon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily believed, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreaty of his Mother very hardly delivered, and sent back into his own Province.

SECT. II.

The preparation of Cyrus, and his first entry into the War.

THE form of Government which the Persian Lieutenants used in their several Provinces, was in many points almost Regal. For they made war and peace, as they thought it meet, not only for the Kings behoof, but for their own reputation; usually indeed with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their own heads were held only at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his will, whatever it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himself the interest that he had in the Kingdom; the small assurance of his Brothers love, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endued by his late imprisonment; and the means which he had by love of his own people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedaemonians, whom he had bound unto him, to obtain the Crown for himself. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waiting till occasion should present itself: but rather enterprise somewhat whilst yet his Mother lived, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than only questionable. Hereupon he first began to quarrel with Tissaphernes, and seized upon many Towns of his Jurisdiction, annexing them to his own Province, which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that he was of condition forgetful of what simple) being truly paid by Cyrus the considerable Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his Brothers hot spirit exercised in private quarrels. But Tissaphernes whose sole conditions were hated, and cowardly dejected, although he durst not adventure to take arms against Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Milesians were about to give up themselves into the hands of that young Prince, as many other Towns of the Ionian had done, thought by terror to preserve his reputation, and keep the Town in his own hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing fair occasion to take arms, which was no small part of his desire. In levying Soldiers he used great policy; for he took not only the men of his own Province, or of the Countys adjoining, whose lives were ready at his will; but secretly he furnished some Grecian Captains with money, who being very good men of War, entertained Soldiers therewith, some of them waiting in Thrace, others in Thessaly, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to cross the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had secret instructions to prolong their several Wars, that the Soldiers might be held in continual exercise, and ready in arms upon the sudden. Cyrus having sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greeks, who very readily came over to his assistance, being thirteen thousand very firm Soldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Army, and that which he had levied before, he could very easily have forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the less: but his purpose was not to lose time in small matters, that was to be employed in the accomplishment of higher designs. Pretending therefore that the Pisidians, a people of Asia the less, not subject to the Persian, had invaded his Territory; he raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speed marched Eastward, leaving Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leisure to rejoice that Cyrus had left him to himself, when he considered that so great an Army, and so strong, was never levied against the Rovers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of five hundred horse, he postd away to carry tidings to the Court of this great preparation.

SECT. III.

How Cyrus took his journey into the higher Asia, and came up to his brother.

THE Tumult which his coming brought, was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queen Statira against Parysatis, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the War. But whilst the King in great fear was arming the high Countys in his defence, the danger halted upon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, having his number much increased by the access of seven hundred Greeks, and of other four hundred of the same Nation, who revolted unto him from the King. How terrible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by trial in a Muster, which (to please the Queen of Cicilia, who had brought him aid) he made in Phrygia; where the Greeks by his direction making offer of a charge upon the rest of his Army, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Camp (not perceiving that this was but a bravery) fled again, the victuallers and baggagers forsaking their Cabins, and running all away for very fear. This was to Cyrus a joyful spectacle, who knew very well that his Brother was followed by men of fame temper, and the more unlikely to make resistance, because they were preft to the War against their will and dispositions, whereas his Army was drawn along by meer affection and good will. Nevertheless he found it a very hard matter to persuade the Greeks to pass the River of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had trodden, wearied them with the conceit of the tedious return. Therefore he was driven, being yet in Cicilia, to seek excuses, telling them, that Artaxerxes, one of the Kings principal Captains, and his own great enemy, lay by the River, against whom he requested them to assist him. By such devices, and excessive promise of reward, he brought them to Euphrates; where some of the Greeks considering, that who so passed the River first, should have the most thanks, and might fairly return if the rest should refuse to follow them; they entered the Fords, whereby all were finally periwaded, and so to some had begun: and being allured by great hopes, they resolved to seek out Artaxerxes where soever he was to be found. The King in the mean time having raised an Army of nine hundred thousand men, was not so confident upon this huge multitude, as to adventure them in trial of a plain battle. Artaxerxes, who with three hundred thousand men, had undertaken to make good the Streets of Syrus, which were very narrow, and fortified with a strong wall, and other defences of nature and art, which made the place to seem impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himself toward the Kings forces, not daring to look down Cyrus in the face; who despairing to find any way by land, had procured the Lacedaemonian Fleet, by the benefit whereof to have transported his Army. I do not find that this cowardice of Artaxerxes, or his Soldiers, who arrived not at the Camp till five days were past after the battle, received either punishment, or disgrace; for they toward whom he withdrew himself, were all made of the same metal. Therefore Artaxerxes was upon the point of retiring to the uttermost bounds of his Kingdom, until by Teribazus, one of his Captains, he was persuaded not to abandon to many goodly Provinces to the enemy, who would thereby have gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharp dispute of Title to a Kingdom is most available) would have grown superiour in reputation. By such advice, the King relolved upon meeting with his Brother, who now began to be secure, being fully periwaded that Artaxerxes would never dare to abide him in the field. For the King having cast up a Trench of almost forty miles in length, about thirty foot broad, and eighteen foot deep, intended there to have encamped; but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so safe as to be far distant from his enemies.

SECT. VI.

The Battle between Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

THE Army of Cyrus having overcome many difficulties of evil ways, and scarcity of victuals, was much encouraged by perceiving this great fear of Artaxerxes; and being past this Trench, marched carefully in great disorder, having belovewed their Arms in Carts, and upon Beasts of carriage; when on the sudden one of their Van-currors brought news of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselves, and had great accident had breathed new courage into the ranged their Battels in good order upon the side of the River Euphrates, where they waited for the coming of their enemies, whom they saw not till it was afternoon. But when they saw the cloud of dust raised by the feet of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceived by their near approach how well they were marshalled, coming on very orderly in silence; whereas it had been expected, that rushing violently with loud clamours, they should have spent all their force upon the first brunt; and when it appeared that from the fronts of the two Armies were to be unequal in distant, being all embattelled in one body and square, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the midst of his own, did not with the corner, and utmost point thereof, reach to the half breadth of Artaxerxes his battel, which carried nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greeks begin to distrust their own menhood, which was not accustomed to make proof of it self upon such excessive odds. It was almost incredible, that so great an Army should be so easily chased. Nevertheless it quickly appeared, that these Persians having learned (contrary to their custom) to give charge upon their enemies with silence, had not received (for it was contrary to their nature) to learn a strong charge with courage. Upon the very first offer of an on-set, made by the Greeks, all that beately rabble of cowards fled again, without abiding the stroke, or flaying till they were within reach of a dart. The Chariots armed with hooks and stiths (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twenty) did small hurt that day, because the drivers of them leaping down, fled away on foot. This base demeanour of his enemies gave so much confidence to Cyrus and his Followers, that such as were about him, forthwith adored him as King. And certainly, the Title had been assured unto him that day, had not he sought how to declare himself worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For perceiving that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him void, was about to encompass the Greeks, and to set upon them in the rear, he advanced with six hundred Horse, and gave to valiant a charge upon a squadron of six thousand, which lay before the King, that he brake it, slaying the Captain thereof, Artaxerxes with his own hands, and putting all the rest to flight. Hereupon his whole company of six hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chase, leaving Cyrus too ill attended; who perceiving where the King stood in troop, uncertain whether to fight, or leave the field, could not contain himself, but said, I see the man; and presently with a small handful of men about him, ran upon his Brother, whom he stroke through the Gurock, and wounded in the breast. Having given immediately the fatal blow, which gave period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded under the eye with a Dart, thrown by a base fellow, where-with astonished, he fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it was unpossible to have recovered him, though all which were with him, did their best for his safety; not caring afterwards for their own lives, when once they perceived that Cyrus their Master was slain. Artaxerxes cauled the head and right hand of his Brother to be forthwith stricken off, and shewed to his people, who now pursuing brought news of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselves, and had great accident had breathed new courage into the ranged their Battels in good order upon the side

Captains as were now even in their own eyes no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Camp of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned; from whence Artaxerxes making all speed, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greeks, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There he met with Tissaphernes, who having made way through the Battle of the Greeks, was ready now to join with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the news which Artaxerxes brought with him, and his Brothers death been sufficient to countervail all disasters received, the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greeks, would have yielded little comfort. For Tissaphernes had not slain any one man of the Greeks; but contrariwise, when he came upon them, they opening their Battle, drove him with great slaughter through them, in such wise, that he rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the Squadron of the Greeks. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greeks, as Matters of the field, gave chase to all that came in their fight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greeks, intending to sit upon them in the rear. But these good Soldiers perceiving the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seek honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being pursued unto a certain Village that lay under a hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a bravery, than with purpose to attempt upon these bold fellows any further. For he knew well, that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom he would seem to have slain with his own hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to give reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that he might now preserve well enough, shewing a manly look half a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he advanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displaid on the top of a Spear. This Ensign might have encouraged his people, had not some of the Greeks espied it, who not meaning that he should abide so near them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discovering their approach, fled upon the spur; so that none remained in the place of battle, save only the Greeks, who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harm, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondered that they heard no news of Cyrus, but thinking that he was pursuing the Army, they thought it was fittest for them, having that day done enough, to return to their Quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings coming had given them no leisure to dine.

SECT. V.

The hard estate of the Greeks after the fight; and how Artaxerxes in vain sought to have made them yield unto him.

IT was now about the setting of the Sun, and they bringing home dark night with them, found their Camp spoiled, little or nothing being left that might serve for food: so that wanting victuals to satiate their hunger, they refreshed their weary bodies with sleep. In the mean season Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entered by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived that the benefits of his people, and weakness of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greeks: which gave him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shameful demeanor of his Army, should live to carry tidings home, it would not be long ere with greater forces they disjunct with him for his whole Signory. Wherefore he resolved to try all means whereby he might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carry tidings of that which he had seen: to which purpose he sent them a brave message the next morning, charging them to deliver up their Arms, and come to his Gates, to await there upon his Mercy. It seems that he was in good hope to have found their high courages broken, upon report of his Brothers death: but he was greatly deceived in that thought. For the Greeks being advertised that morning from Arius, a principal Commander under Cyrus, that his Master being slain, he had retired himself to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from thence, whence intending to return into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would join with him, but resolving to stay no longer: they fell and went back to Arius, that having beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arius himself in the Kings Throne, if he would join with them, and pursue the Victory. Before they received any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Camp, whole errand seemed to the Captains very insolent: One told them, that it was not for the Vanquishers to yield their Weapons; another, that he would die ere he yielded to such a motion: a third asked, Whether the Kings, as having the Victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in a way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what countenance he meant to requite their kindness. To this question Phalimus a Græciæ an, waiting upon Tissaphernes, answered, that the King having slain Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdom, in the midst whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold up their throats; for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words to them who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore one told Phalimus, that having nothing left but their Arms and Valour, whilst they kept their Arms, their Valour would be serviceable; but should they yield them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remain their own. Hereat Phalimus laughed, saying, This young man did seem a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech, but that his deep speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Arms and Valour to prevail against the great King. It seems that Phalimus being a Courtier, and employed in a business of importance, thought himself too profound a Statesman, to be checked in his Embassy by a bookish dissembler. But his wisdom herein failed him. For whatsoever he himself was (of whom no more is known, than that he brought an unheeded message to his own Countrymen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons and Lives to the mercileless Barbarians) this young Scholar by him despised, was that great Xenophon who when all the principal Commanders were surprized by treachery of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and having never seen the Wars before, undertook the conduct of the Army, which he brought first into Greece, freeing it from all thole, and from greater dangers dangers than Phalimus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithful to the King, as they had been to Cyrus, offering their service in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might have use of them. But the final answer was, That with out Weapons they could neither do the King good as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalimus delivered the Kings furthest pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilst they abode where they then were, denouncing War if they stirred thence; Whereunto he required their answer. Clearchus the General told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalimus) must I understand you? As choosing peace if we stay, or otherwise War, saith Clearchus. But whether War or peace, quoth this politick Ambassador? To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose), Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him no wiser than he came. All that day the Greeks were fain to feed upon their Horses, Affes, and other Beasts, which they rolled with Arrows, Darts, and wooden Targets, thrown away by the Enemies.

SECT. VI.

How the Greeks began to return homewards.

AT night they took their way towards Arius, to whom they came at midnight; being forsaken by four hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fell over to the King; by whom, how they were entertained, I do not find. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces, for had they been kindly used, it may well be thought that some of them should have accompanied Tissaphernes, and served as Stales to draw in the rest. Arius being of too haughty a temper and birth, to think upon seeking the Kingdom for himself, with such assistance as might have given it unto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make Covenant with them for mutual assistance unto the last: Whereunto both parts having sworn, he advised them to take another way homeward, which should be somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relieve them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, having made a wearisome march, and tired the Soldiers, they found the Kings Army which had coasted them, lodged in certain Villages, towards which Clearchus made directly, because he would not seem by declining them, to shew fear, or weakness. That the Kings men were contented to remove, and give place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behaviour; Nor strange, that the Græcians, being weary and hungry, and lying among enemies in an unknown Country, should be very fearful: but it is almost past belief, that the noise which was heard of these poor men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition informed them to do, should make the Persians fly out of their Camp, and so affright the great King, that instead of demanding their Arms, he should crave peace of them. The next day very early came messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free access for Ambassadors, to entreat of peace. Were it not that such particulars do best improve the quality of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to run over the general passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for Battle, because the Greeks (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to hear of Truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes dissembling the indignity, was contented sweetly to swallow down this pill, lending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of victuals to relieve them.

SECT. VII.

How Tissaphernes under colour of peace, betrayed all the Captains of the Greeks.

Hitherto the Greeks, relying upon their own virtues, had rather advanced their affairs, than brought themselves into any freights or terms of disadvantage. But now came unto them the subtle Fox Tissaphernes, who circumventing the Chief Commanders by fine sleights, did mischievously entrap them, to the extrem danger of the Army. He told them that his Province, lying near unto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliverance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countrymen at home, would not be unthankful for such a benefit. Herewithal he forgot not to rehearse the great service that he had done to his Master, being the first that advertised him of Cyrus his intent, and having not only brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battle shewed his face to the Greeks, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Camp, and gave chase to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I alleg to the King, entreating that he would give me leave to conduct you safe into Greece; in which case I have good hope to speed, if you will send a mild answer to him, who hath willd me to ask you, For what cause ye have born Arms against me? The Captains hearing this, were contented to give gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly, as he said) that peace should be granted: the conditions whereof were; That they should pass freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for that they took, and committing no spoil: yet that it should be lawful for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to afford them an open Market. Hereupon both parties having sworn, the League was concluded; and Tissaphernes, returning to the King to take leave, and end all business, came unto them again after twenty days, and then they set forward. This interim of twenty days, which Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, mislaid great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For he doubts his long absence, which alone sufficed to breed jealousy, the Brethren, the Kindred of Arius, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Soldiers, did work him and them so with assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more strange to the Greeks than formerly he had been. This caused many to advise Clearchus, rather to pass forward as well as he might, than to rely upon Covenants, and sit still whilst the King layd snares to entrap them. But he on the contrary perswaded them, to rest contented whilst they were well, and not to cast themselves again into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treaty; reciting withal their own wants, and the Kings means, but especially the Oaths mutually given and taken, wherewith he favo'ed the enemy should have clogged himself if he meant mischief, having power enough to do them harm by a fair and open War.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable man (if honour may be valued by greatness and place in Court) which caused his Oath to be the more esteemed, inasmuch as no enforcement, or bare respect, was like to have drawn it from him. But his falsehood was such, both in substance and in effects, as may fitly expound that saying, which proceeded from the fountain of Truth, I hate a rich man a liar. A lie may find excuse when it grows out of fear: for that passion hath his original from weakness. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of untruth, the falsehood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, advancing his own strength against the Divine Justice, doth commit that in with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with sure vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found means to defraud all the Captains, whom he subtilly got into his power by a train; making the General Clearchus himself the mean to draw in all the rest. The business was contrived thus: Having travelled some days together, in such wise that the Persians did not encamp with the Greeks, who were very jealous of the great familiarity appearing between Tissaphernes and Arius; Clearchus thought it convenient to root out of Tissaphernes his brains all causes of distrust, whereof many had grown in that short time. To which purpose obtaining private conference with him, he rehearsed the Oath of Confederacy, which had past between them, shewing how religiously he would keep it; and repeating the benefits which the Greeks did receive by the help of Tissaphernes, he promised that their love should appear to him not unfruitful, if he would make use of their service against the Assyrians, or Persians, who were accustomed to inflict his Provinces; or against the Egyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause he desired him, that whereas all divine and humane respects had linked them together, he would not give place to any close accusation or suspicion, whereby might grow sudden inconvenience to either of them, upon no just ground. The faithless Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministered fair occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to mind how many ways he could have used to bring them to confusion; without peril to himself; especially by burning the Country, through which they were to pass, whereby they must needs have perished by meer famine. For which cause he said, that it had been great folly, to seek by perjury, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his hands. But the truth was, that his own love to them had moved him to work their safety, not only for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himself, and the King, by their assistance; but for that he might by their friendship hope to obtain what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he invited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captains with him to the same place, where in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissention between them. Clearchus himself being thus deceived, with great importunity drew all the chief Commanders, and many of the inferior Leaders to repair with him to the Camp of Tissaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Soldiers, as it had been to some common Fair. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the five principal Colonels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a sign was given, upon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slain. Forthwith certain bands of Persian Horsemen scoured the field, killing as many Greeks as they met, and riding up to the very Camp of the Gracians, who wondered much at all that had been done. Hereupon the Greeks took Arms in haste, thinking that the enemy would forthwith have assailed their Camp. Anon they might perceive the Embassadors of Tissaphernes, among whom were his own Brother, and Arius followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principal men in the Army, saying That they brought a message from the King, which Arius delivered to this effect: That Clearchus having broken his faith, and the League made, was justly rewarded with death; that Atamem and Proxenus, two other of the five Colonels, for detecting his treachery, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to surrender their arms which were due to him, as having belonged unto his servant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed upon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadors, That if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was well that he was in such sort punished; but he willed them to send back Atamem and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly loved, and that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greeks might be advised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadors knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus and the other four were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandment their heads were broken off. I hold it not amiss to prevent the order of time, renewing to this perfidiousness of Tissaphernes, the annex which he afterward received. He saw his Province wasted by the Greeks, against whom receiving from his Master convenient aid of men and money, he did so ill manage his affairs, that neither subtilty, nor perjury (to which he failed not to have recourse) availed him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who took it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treachery, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the service which he could not do, he was thought upon private ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to fly from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. But now let us return to the prosperity wherein he triumphed with great cause, having betrayed braver men than himself, and intending to bring the like mischief upon the whole Army.

SECT. VIII.

How Xenophon heartened the Greeks, and in despite of Tissaphernes went off safely.

Great was the heaviness of the Soldiers, being now left destitute of Leaders, and no less their fear of the evil hanging over their heads, which they knew not well how to avoid. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deep sadness of the whole Army, to be such as hindered them from taking any course of preventing the danger at hand, began to advise the under-officers of Proxenus his Companies, whose familiar friend he had been, to bethink themselves of some mean, whereby their safety might be wrought, and the Soldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes whatsoever might serve for to give them hope, and above all, persuading them in no wise to yield to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take upon him the charge of that Regiment; and to together with him, the same night calling up such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeed in the places of those who were slain, or taken. This being done, and order set down for disburdening the Army of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the loss of Tissaphernes his assistance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheap than he had been wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take up their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentiful Villages, and so to proceed, marching towards the heads of those great Rivers, which lay in their way, and to pass them where they were fordable. Many attempts were made upon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, serving all on foot, were not able to requite for the harm which they received by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greeks could reach. For this cause did Xenophon provide slings, wherewith he overreached the enemy; and finding some Horfes fit for service, that were employed among the carriages, he set men upon them; training likewise his Archers to shoot compass, who had been accustomed to the point-blank. By these means did he bear off the Persians, who assailed him; and sometimes gave them chase with that band of fifty Horfes, which being well back with a firm body of footmen, and seconded with troops of the light-armed shot and slingers, compelled the enemy to fly aloof. Tissaphernes not daring to come to handy-gripes with these resolute men, did possess the tops of mountains, and places of advantage, by which they were to pass. But finally, when their valour made way through all such difficulties, he betook himself to that course, which was indeed the surest, of burning the Country. With great sorrow did the Greeks behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some advised to defend the Country, as granted by the enemy himself to be theirs; others to make more fires, if perhaps the Persians might be ashamed to do that which was the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; but these were faint comforts. The best counsel was, that being near unto the Carduchi, a people enemy to the Persian, they should enter into their Country, passing over some high mountains which lay between them. This course they followed, which could not have availed them, if Tissaphernes had begun sooner to cut off their victuals, rather than to seek to force, or circumvent them by his fine wit.

SECT. IX.

The difficulties which the Greek Army found in passing thorow the Land of the Carduchi.

Entering upon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountered with many difficulties of ways, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Persian, were no way inferior to the Greeks in daring, but only in the art of War. They were very light of foot, skilful Archers, and used the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Country were of much use against their poor travellers, afflicting them in several ways which they spent in that passage, far more than all the power of the Great King had done. Between the Territory of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ran Centries a great River, upon which the Greeks refreshed themselves one day, rejoicing that they had so well escaped their dangers, and hoping that the remainder would prove easie. But the next morning they saw certain troops of Horfe, that lay to forbid their passage. These were levied by the Kings Deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies having taken their way towards Ionia. The River was broad and deep, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite banks. To increase their dangers, the Carduchi following upon them, lay on the side of a Mountain, within less than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discover a Ford, by which the greater number of them passing over, did easily chase away the subjects of the Persian, and then sending back the most expedite men, gave succour to the Rearward, against which the Carduchi being slightly armed, could not on plain ground make resistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seem to have inhabited the Mountains of Niphates, which are not far from the Springs of Tygris, though Ptolemy place them far more to the East upon the River of Cyrcus in Media; wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded upon his own knowledge, doth best in this case deserve credit. Of the River Centries (as of many other Rivers, Towns and Places mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a conjecture, which may endure the severity of a Critick. For Ptolemy, and the whole Nation of Geographers, add small light to this Expedition: only of this last, I think it the same which falleth into Tygris, not much above Artafogaria, springing out of Niphates, and running by the Town of Sardeva in Gordene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greeks having passed Centries, did arrive.

SECT. X.

How Teribazus Governour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greeks with terms of feigned peace, was disappointed, and shamefully beaten.

THE Army finding in Armenia good provision, marched without any disturbance about fifty or threescore miles to the heads of the River Tigris, and passing over them, travelled as far further without resistance, till they were encountered by Teribazus, at the River Telbas, which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though small, but Ptolemy and others omit it. Teribazus governed that Country for the Persian, and was in great favour with Artaxerxes, whose Court may seem to have been a School, where the Art of falsehood was taught as wisdom. He desired peace of the Greeks, which was made upon this condition, That they should take what they pleased, but not burn down the Towns and Villages in their way. As soon as he had made this league, he levied an Army, and besetting the streights of certain Mountains which they were to pass, hoped well to make such benefit of their security, as might give him the commendation of being no less craftily dishonest than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of success. For a great Snow fell, which caused the Greeks to make many fires, and scatter themselves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandered about seeking relief. By the fires he was discovered, and by a Soldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was revealed. Hereupon the Greeks, taking this captive with them for a guide, fought him out, and coming upon his Camp, did so fright him, that before the whole Army could arrive there, the shout which was raised by the Van-couriers, chased him away. They took his Pavillion, wherein (besides many slaves, that were Artificers of voluptuousness) very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Army went Northward, and passing Euphrates not far below the springs thereof, travelled with much difficulty through deep fens, being followed aloof by the Enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found straggling behind. The inhabitants of the Country through which they marched, had their wintering-houses under ground, wherein was found great plenty of Victuals, and of Cattel, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the Owners. Having refreshed themselves in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable journey, which had consumed many of them with extrem cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-slaves, and taking away (besides other Horses and Cattel) some Colts that were bred up for the great King.

SECT. XI.

The passage of the Army to Trabyzond, shewing the Countries bordering upon the River of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the River Phasis, near whereunto the people called Pha- siani, Tacchi, and Chalybes, were seated. These Nations joined together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountains which the Greeks were to pass, made countenance of war; but some companies being sent by night to seize upon a place of equal height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these people to fly, every one retiring to the defence of his own. The first upon whose Country the Greeks did enter, were the Tacchi, who conveying all their provision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Army into much want, until with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great force of Cattel were taken; the people to avoid captivity, threw themselves head-long down the rocks, the very women throwing down first their own children, and then casting themselves upon them. Here was taken a great booty of cattle, which served to feed them, travelling through the Land of Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountered the Greeks hand to hand, killing as many as they took prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great grief of their companions living, who were glad when after seven days journey they escaped from those continual skirmishes wherewith they had been vexed by these Barbarians. Hence travelling through good Corn-country inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Scythians, they came to a rich Town, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoining, used them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountain, whence they might discover the Euxine Sea. From Gymnium (which was the name of his Town) he led them through the Territory of his Enemies, desiring them of water to kindle fire. After five days march, they came to a Mountain called Teches, being (as I think) a part of the Mountains called Moschici, whence their Guide shewed them the Sea, towards which they bent their course; and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones (with whom, by means of an Interpreter found among themselves, who, born in that place, had been sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the Land of Colchis, wherein stands the City of Trabyzond, called then Trapexus, a Colony of the Greeks. The Colchis entertaining them with hostility, were requited with the like; for the Army having now good leisure to repose themselves among their friends the Trapexuntians, did spoil the Country thirty days together, forbearing only the borders upon Trabyzond, at the Citizens request.

SECT. XII.

How the Army began at Trabyzond to provide a fleet wherewith to return home by Sea: how they came into the Territory of Synope, & there prosecuted the same purpose.

HAVING now found an Haven-Town, the Soldiers were desirous to take shipping and change their tedious Land-journeys into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cherisiphus a Lacedaemonian, one of the principal Commanders, promised by means of Anaxibius the Lacedaemonian Admiral, who was his friend, that he would provide Vessels to embark embark them. Having thus concluded, they likewise took order for the staying of such ships as should pass that way, meaning to use them for their Navigation. Left all this provision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Army, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adjoining to clear the ways, and make an easie passage for them by Land; whereunto the Soldiers were utterly unwilling to give ear, being desirous to return by Sea; but the Country, fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily consent to Xenophon's request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapexuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring Ships into the Port of Trabyzond: the other took Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were stayed to increase the Fleet. After long abode, when Victuals began to fail, by reason that all the Land of the Colchis, near unto the Camp, was already quite wasted, they were fain to embark their sick men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few Ships which they had already provided. The rest of the Army took their way by land to Cerasus, a Greek Town, where the Fleet likewise arrived. Here the Army being mustered, was found to consist of Eight thousand and six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Country of the (a) Mosynati, who were divided into factions. The stronger party despising their friendship, caused them to join them with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was (b) Coryra, a Greek Town likewise, and a Colony of the Synopians, as Trapexus and Cerasus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sick men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Soldiers entered the Town by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sick in convenient lodgings, taking into their own hands the custody of the Gates. Provision for the Army they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territory of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Town. These news were unwelcome to (c) Sinope, whence Embassadors were sent to the Camp, who complaining of their dealings, and threatening to join with the Paphlagonians, if redress could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon. That meer necessity had enforced the Army to teach those of Coryra good manners in so bad a method: letting them know, that he feared not to deal with them and the Paphlagonians at once, though perhaps the Paphlagonians would be glad to take Sinope itself; to which, if cause were given, they would lend assistance. Upon this answer the Embassadors grew better advised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Town of Coryra to relieve the Soldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with Shipping, letting them understand how difficult the passage by Land would prove, in regard of the many and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Arctephemus, which crossed their way. This good counsel, and the fair promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Army, which well perceived, that the City of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would pass the rest of the way by Sea; provided, that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serve to embark every one of them; then would they not put from the shore:

SECT. XIII.

Of Disfection which arose in the Army, and how it was embarked.

HITHERTO the danger of Enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the company in firm unity; which now began to dissolve and to thaw, by the neighbouring air of Greece, warming their heads with private respects to their several ends and purposes. Whilst they, who were sent as Agents from the Camp, remained at Sinope, Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunity of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honourable work to build a City in those parts, which were so unlike to prove great and wealthy, in regard both of their own puissance, and of the great repair of the Greeks into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Country, divining of his success by the entrails of beasts. The Soothsayer whom he employed, had received a great reward of Cyrius, for conjecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not give battle in ten days: he therefore having preferred his money carefully, was desirous to be soon at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diversity of mens opinions; some approving the motion, but the greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclaea, being informed of this consultation, were so afraid, lest the poverty of the Soldiers, who had not wherewith to maintain themselves at home, should give success to the project. Which to prevent, they promised to supply the Army with a sufficient Fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captains, who thereupon undertook to give the Soldiers pay, if they would presently set sail for Greece. One of these Captains being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Tractus; another offered to lead them into Cherronesus. Xenophon, who desired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these Propositions, and professed openly that he would have them to sit forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a Traitor that should forsake the Army, before such time as they were arrived at their journeys end. Silanus the Soothsayer, who had uttered Xenophon's purpose, was hereby flayed from out-running his fellows, and driven to abide with his wealth among poor men, longer than he would with his good liking. All the other Captains were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived that Ships were prepared sufficient for their Navigation; but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Soldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope and Heraclaea, knowing that the Army was now resolved for the Voyage, and that Xenophon whom they feared, had perswaded them to this resolution, thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Navy, whilst they were in good readiness to depart, but to keep the money to themselves. The Captains therefore, who being disappointed by these Towns, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had seen ved with fair hopes, repented much of their fair officers, and signifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make proposition to the Army, of taking the Ships, and failing to Phasis, where they might seize upon Lands, and plant themselves in such wise as should stand best with their good living. But finding him cold in the business, they began to work the principal of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These news becoming publick, bred a suspicion of Xenophon, as if he had won the rest of the Captains to his purpose, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their own home. Wherefore assembling the Companies, he gave them satisfaction, and withal complained of some disorders, which he caused them to redress. A general inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadors from Corylus, Lord of the Taphlagonians, who lending presents, desired peace of the Greeks: the Embassadors were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have been sought, for that the Greek having now their Fleet in a readiness, did soon weigh Anchors, and set sail for Hermene the Port of Synope, whither Cherisiphus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxibius, who promised to give the Army pay as soon as they came into the parts of Greece.

SECT. XIV.

Another great dissent and distraction of the Army. How the Mutiniers were beaten by the Barbarians, and rescued by Xenophon.

THE nearer that they approached to Greece, the greater was their desire to make provision for themselves, that they might not return home empty-handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Army were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, he might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon sole Commander of all; in whose favour as well the Captains as the common Soldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedaemonians, who were jealous of him already (being incited by that fugitive who forsook the Army at Trabizanda, flying with one of their two Ships) or moved by some tokens appearing to him in the intrails that threatened ill success to his Government, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laid upon Cherisiphus a Lacedaemonian. It seems that Xenophon, considering the vexation incident to the conduct of a Voluntary Army, wanting pay, did wisely in yielding to such tokens as forbade him to accept it: especially knowing to well their desire, which was, by right or by wrong, to get wealth wheresoever it might be found, without all regard of friend or foe. Cherisiphus had been General but six or seven days when he was deposited; for having been unwilling to rob the Town of Heraclae, which had sent Presents to the Camp, and been very beneficial unto them in lending Ships for their transportation. Two days they had sailed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great Rivers, which would have given impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heraclae, where consulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one seditious man began to put them in mind of seeking to get somewhat for themselves; telling them that all their provision would be spent in three days; and that being now come out of the Enemies Country, victuals and other necessities could not be had without money; for which cause he gave advice to send messengers into the Town of Heraclae, giving the Citizens to understand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of money, called Cyziceni; which sum amounteth to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the sum raised to ten thousand Cyziceni at least; which, to require, they thought Cherisiphus, as being General, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon, but in vain, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Left therefore either of these should fail in managing the business which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudency and less discretion were sent; who in such wise delivered their insolent message, that the Citizens taking time to deliberate upon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Town, Walls. When the Soldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their ravenous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, that their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the most part of them Acadians and Achaens, they forsook immediately Cherisiphus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their own number. Above four thousand and five hundred they were, all heavily armed; woelecting ten Captains, sailed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the midway between Heraclae and Byzantium, with purpose to assail the Bythinians on the sudden. With Cherisiphus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and four hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and forty horse; which small band had done good service already, and could not have been spared now. Cherisiphus had agreed with Cleander Governour of Byzantium, to meet him at the mouth of the River Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to convey him over into Greece; for which cause he took his way thither by Land, leaving to Xenophon such Shipping as he had; who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed upon the confines of Heraclae, and Thrasia Alitica, intending to make a cut through the midland Country to the Propontis. The Mutiniers who had landed at Calphas by night, with purpose to take spoils in Bythinia, divided themselves into ten Companies, every Captain leading his own Regiment into some Village five or six miles from the Sea; in the greater Towns were two Regiments quartered: and so was that part of the Country surprized on the sudden, and sacked all at one time. The place of Rendezvous was an high piece of Ground, where some of them arrived, finding no disturbance, others not without much trouble and danger: two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaped, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians, which had slipped at first out of the Soldiers hands, did raise the Country; and finding the Greeks laden with booty, took the advantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill whereon they encompassed. One great advantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retreat from these Acadians and Achaens, who wanting the assistance of horse, and having neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driven to stand merely upon their defence, bearing off with great danger and many wounds received, the Darts and Arrows of the Barbarians; till finally they were driven from their watering place, and enforced to crave parley. Whatsoever the Articles of composition were, the Thracians would give none, but pledges for assurance, they would give none, without which the Greeks well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incited, were nothing worth. In the mean time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the Inland-Region, did enquire of some Travellers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Army, passing along those parts: and receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly thrown themselves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides, them who gave him the intelligence. His horsemen he sent before to discover, and to scour the ways; the light armed footmen took the hill-tops on either hand, all of them firing fire on whatever they found combustible; whereby the whole Country seemed to be on a light flame, to the great terror of the enemies, who thought that some huge Army had approached. That night he encamped on a hill, within five miles of the Acadians, increasing still the numbers of his fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soon after Supper. The enemies perceiving this, thought certainly that he would have fallen upon them in the dark, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early in the next morning Xenophon coming thither in very good order, to have given battle, found that his device to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he marvelled that the Greeks were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquiry, that they removed at break of day, and perceived by signs that they had taken the way to the Port of Calphas, in which journey he overtook them. They embraced him and his with great joy: confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that he should have come by night; wherein finding themselves deceived, they were afraid lest he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away to overtake him, and join with him. So they arrived at the Haven of Calphas, where it was decreed, That whosoever from thenceforth made any motion to disjoin the Army, should suffer death.

SECT. XV.

Of divers pieces of service done by Xenophon; and how the Army returned into Greece. The occasions of the War between the Lacedaemonians and the Persians.

THE Haven of Calphas lay under a goodly Head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kind of Grain and Fruits, excepting Olives. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very convenient Sea for a great City. All which commodities that might have allured the Soldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to haste away, fearing lest Xenophon should find some device to have settled himself and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good means to live at home; neither did they so much for hope of gain follow Cyrus in that War, as in regard of his Honour, and the love which they bare unto him: the poorer sort were such as left their Parents, Wives and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to return. But whether it were so, that Xenophon found advantage by their own disposition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected, or whether the signs appearing in the intrails, did indeed forbid their departure; so long they were intreated to abide in the place till victuals failed: neither would the Captains lead them forth to forage the Country until the Sacrifices should promise good success. Cherisiphus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heraclaeans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joined to the rest of the Army, which the greater it was, the more provision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Colonel into the place of Cherisiphus, would needs adventure to gratifie the Soldiers with the spoil of some Villages that stood near at hand; in which enterprize he found ill success, the whole Country lying in wait to intrap him, and an Army of Horse being led by Pharnabazus the Satrap, or Viceroy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians; which troops falling upon the Greeks that were scattered abroad in seeking booty, slew five hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certain Mountain thereby. The news of this overthrow coming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Army to the rescue of those that survived, and brought them safe to the Camp; upon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps de garde, flew home, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Army, so disheartened and unfurnished of necessities, caused the Greeks to remove their Camp to a place of more strength; which having intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to endure travel, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to bury those which were lately slain, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their assailants. In this journey his demeanor was very honourable. For having given burial to the dead, the enemy was discovered, lying on the top of the hills adjoining, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leave at their backs a Wood scarce passable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, That he had rather follow the enemy with half the number, than turn his back to them with twice as many; and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarians, he would not fail with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the Camp, yet what should they do there, wanting victuals to sustain them in the place, and ships to carry them away? Wherefore he willed them rather to fight well that day, having eaten their Dinners, than another day fasting; and not to regard the uneasy return, which might serve to stay Covards from running away, but to wish unto the Enemy a fair and easy way, by which he might fly from them. Their perswasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Country forthwith, removing their Families, and leaving all that could not suddenly be conveyed away, to the discretion of the Greeks, who had general licence, gathered the Harvest of these had Neighbour fields. This was the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not only suffered quietly to enjoy the spoil of the Country, but when the occasion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colony on the Port of Calpas, Embassadors were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make offer of their best assistance. But the Soldiers had no mind to Ray. Wherefore entering further into Ephesus, they took a great booty, which they carried away into Chrysolis, a City near unto Chalcidius, where they sold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly vex, left their long stay in that Country might breed in them a desire to visit his Province, where they might have found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he sent to the Lacedæmonian Admiral, intreating him with much instance and large promises to wait them over into Europe, to whom Anaxibius the Admiral condescending, promised to give the Soldiers pay, as soon as they arrived at Byzantium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreaty of the Persian, who in the height of his pride had thought them to surely imprisoned with misty Rivers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but would them to surrender their Arms into his hands, and so to yield their lives to his discretion. How discontentedly they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to require his injurious dealings, they kized upon Byzantium, which by Xenophons persuasion they forbore to sack, I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertain little to the general course of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discover the secrets of Asia, and stir up the Greeks to think upon greater enterprises than ever their forefathers had undertaken. Likewise it was the only remarkable action which the time afforded. For the Roman Wars did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Towns of Italy; and in Greece all things were quiet; the Lacedæmonians ruling insolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the seeds of the War shortly following, which the Lacedæmonians made upon Artaxerxes, were already sown, before these Companies returned out of the high Countreys of Asia. For the Towns of Ionis which had sided with young Cyrus against Tissaphernes, it notagaint the Great King, prepared to rebel; which they thought safer, than to fall into the hands of Tissaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant both of his old Province, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians besought the Lacedæmonians to lend them aid, whereby to recover their liberty; and obtained their request. For a power was sent over, under conduct of Thimbro a Spartan, who bestowed his men in such Towns as had already revolted, to secure the Cities, and their Fields, but not to make any offensive War.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Affairs of Greece, whilst they were managed by the Lacedæmonians.

SECT. I.

How the Lacedæmonians took courage by example of Xenophons Army, to make War upon Artaxerxes.

IT seems that the Lacedæmonians did well perceive in how ill part Artaxerxes took their favour shewed unto his Brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open War against him, thinking it sufficient to take all care that no advantage might slip, which could serve to strengthen their Estate, by finding the Persian work beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Army had revealed the baseness of those effeminate Asiatiques, and rehearsed the many Victories which they themselves had gotten, upon terms of extreme disadvantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of undertaking upon this huge unwieldy Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joint forces of that whole Nation to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handful had opened the passage to Babylon; and further, finding no power that was able to give them resistance, in all that long journey of four and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty five furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about four thousand two hundred fourscore and one, a very painful march of one year and three months. Nevertheless the Civil di-traction wherewith Greece was miserably torn, and especially that hot fire of the Theban War, which kindled with Persian Gold, brake forth suddenly into a great flame, drew back out of Asia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their own Estate; leaving it questionable, whether Agesslaus having both the fame, and far greater forces, could have wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two years, which he spent in Asia, his deeds procured more commendation of magnanimity and fair behaviour, than of stout courage, and great or profitable achievements. For how highlysoever it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other Wars, to extol his virtue; his exploits being only a few incursions into the Countreys lying near the Sea, carrying no proportion to Xenophons own journey, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retreat of Cannæ the Brian, with fix thousand men from Aquilia, to his own Country, through all the breadth of Italy, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodosius, being rather like it, than equal. But of

Agesslaus and his Wars in Asia and Greece, we shall speak more in due place.

SECT. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the War in Asia.

THIMBRO receiving Xenophons men, began to take in Towns, and to entertain all such as were willing to revolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such as had been highly beholden to the King; who seem to have had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to live under the Government of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate, as the King his Master did love him. The managing of the War begun by Thimbro, was for his opprobrious taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaved himself as a good man of War, and a wise Commander. For whereas the Rule of the low Countreys of Asia was divided between Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the Worthier man, but the other by his Princes favour the greater, and having the chief command in those Wars against the Greeks; Dercyllidas, who did bear a private hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischievous nature, and would not be sorry to see his Corridor thoroughly beaten, though to the Kings loss) made an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forthwith entered Æolis, which was under the jurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Province in few days he brought into his own power.

That Country of Æolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gave ease (success to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian, had been Deputy to Pharnabazus in those parts; after whose death his Wife Mania procured his Office, wherein he behaved her self so well, that the not only was beloved of the people under her Government, but enlarged her Territory, by the conquest of certain Towns adjoining; and sundry times the Myssians and Persians. For the had in pay five Companies of Greeks, whose valour by her good usage, did her great service. But somewhat before the arrival of Dercyllidas in those parts, a Son in law of hers called Midias, whom she trusted and loved much, being blinded with ambition, found means to slay her, and kill her Son of seventeen years old; which done, he seized upon two of her principal Towns, wherein her Treasure lay, hoping to have been admitted into possession of her whole Estate. Being denied entrance by her Soldiers that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with Presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Governor in the place of Mania. His Presents were not only rejected by Pharnabazus, but revenge of his foul Treason threatened, whereby the wicked villain was driven into terms of almost utter desperation. In the mean time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Towns of Mania that held against Midias, did quickly open their gates. One only Town stood out four days (against the will of the Citizens, who were covetous of liberty) the Governor striving in vain to have kept it to the use of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities, Gergehe and Scopsis, which the Traitor held; who fearing all men, as being loved of none, sent Embassadors to Dercyllidas, desiring leave to speak with him, and pledges for his security: upon the delivery of which, he issued out of Scopsis, as

and coming into the Camp, made offer to join with the Greeks upon such conditions as might seem reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to let the Citizens freely at liberty. And presently upon their words they marched toward Scopsis. When Midias perceived that it was in vain to strive against the Army, and the Townsmen, which were all of one mind; he quietly went along with Dercyllidas, who remaining but a few hours in the City, did a sacrifice to Minerva, and then leading away the Garrison of Midias, he left the City free, and departed toward Gergehe. Midias did not forsake his company, but followed him, earnestly entreating that he might be suffered to retain Gergehe: but coming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Soldiers that they should be opened; for (quoth Dercyllidas) I must here likewise do a sacrifice to Minerva. The Traitor not daring to make denial, caused his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking possession of the place, tended pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serve under his Ensigns. This done, all the goods of Mania were seized upon, as belonging to one that had been subject to Pharnabazus, who was enemy to the Greeks; and lo the murderous Wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might find any place to hide his dejected head. Dercyllidas having in eight days taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end he took Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of War. That Winter, and the Summer ensuing, the Truce being continued, held; in which time, besides the waiting of Bythinia, the neck of land joining Cherryonta to the Main, was fortified, being four or five miles in breadth; by which means eleven Towns, with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wild Thracians, and made fit and able to victual the Camp. Likewise the City of Astane was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with provision. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta to divert the War into Caria, where was the seat of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not unequal to recover all the Towns of Ionis; Pharax the Admiral of the Fleet (which was a yeasty office) being appointed to join with him. Though it was manifest that Tissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessity; yet was he not in his own danger required with the like. For Pharnabazus having respect to the Kings service, came to assist his private enemy Tissaphernes, and lo passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength, which done, they marched towards Ionis, hoping to find the Towns ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were desirous to keep the War from their own doors, so was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoil and danger of the War, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the River of Maander; and not looking to have been so soon encountered, marched carelessly through the Country: when on the very sudden the whole Army of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discovered, consisting of Persians, Carians, and some Mercenary Greeks, who were all marshalled in very good order to preclude battle. The odds was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readines, as also in advantage of ground: for the Persians had a great multitude of Horse, the Greeks very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plain. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Islanders and others, of such places as bordered upon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselves to present flight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainly discover by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wife. Only Dercyllidas with his Peloponnesians, regarding their Honour, prepared to endure the fight, which must needs have brought them to destruction, if the counsel of Pharnabazus had been followed; who perceiving the opportunity of so great a victory, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of reluctance was made, began to consider, what strange defence the Soldiers of Xenophon had shewed; and thinking that all the Greeks were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to crave parley; the conclusion of which was, That a Truce should be made, to last until Tissaphernes might receive answer from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were on the one part, That all the Greeks in Asia might enjoy their own liberty and laws; but contrariwise on the other side, That the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, and leave the Towns to the Kings pleasure. This Treaty was of none effect, only it served to free the Greeks from the present danger, and to gain time unto Tissaphernes, who desired to avoid the War by procrastination, which he durst not adventure to finish by trial of a Battel.

SECT. III.

How the Lacedæmonians took revenge upon the Eleans for old displeasures. The discontent of the Corinthians and Thebans conceived against the State of Sparta.

IN the mean season the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, began to call the Eleans to account for some disgraces received by them during the late Wars, when leisure was wanting to the requital of such petty injuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympian Games, had let a fine upon the City of Sparta; for Non-payment of which, they forbade them to come to the solemnity; and publicly whipt one of them that was of note, for presuming to contend against their Decree. Likewise they hindered Asius King of Sparta from doing sacrifice to Jupiter; and in all points used great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no business that could hinder them from taking revenge; and therefore sent a peremptory message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at liberty the Cities which they held in subjection. This was the usual pretence which they made the ground of all their Wars; though little they cared for the liberty of such Towns which they called afterwards to become followers, and little better than mere Vassals of the Lacedæmonians. In their late Wars with Athens, the strong opposition which they found, caused this goodly Title of Liberty to work very slowly; but having now to do with a State of great spirit, and small force, it gave present success to their desires. Two years together they sent an Army into the Country of the Eleans; the first year an Earthquake (held in those times a prodigious sign, and which did always forbid the prosecution of any enterprize in hand) caused them to retire: the second year all the Towns of the Eleans did hastily revolt, and the City it self was driven to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subjects freely to enjoy their liberty, and to have her own Walls thrown down. Only the Priestship of the Olympian Games was left unto them, which it was not to be doubted that they would in time coming use modestly, finding themselves to stand at the mercy of Sparta. In this Expedition all the Greeks were affilit to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians and Boeotians, whose aid having been of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian War, as the force of Sparta it self, they could not smother their dislike of their unequal division following the victory; which gave to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes and Corinth only security against Athens, but such a security as was worse than the danger. For when the equal greatness of two mighty Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutral Commonweals to adhere to either, as the condition of their affairs required; but when to revenge injuries, they had by mortal hatred prosecuted the War to extremity, leaving the one City naked of power and friends, the other mightily increased in both; it was then (if not necessary to obey the greatness which themselves had made, yet) foolish and dangerous to provoke it. Nevertheless, it was not the purpose of the Spartans, to take occasion of any quarrel, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victory or composition made some good end with the Persians, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

SECT. IV.

The passage of Agesilaus into Asia. His War with Tissaphernes. How Tissaphernes was put to death; and the War diverted into another Province, through perjury and gifts of Tissaphernes his successor. How carelessly the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

AGESILAUS newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to have the honour of the Victory, which not without cause he expected upon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Army to join with that of Dercyllidas, he took his way in great pomp to Asia in Boeotia, a Haven lying opposite to the Island of Eubœa; in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the War against Troy many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon, he meant also to do sacrifice in Asia; which the Thebans, Lords of that Country, would not permit, but saying, that the performance of such Ceremonies in that place, belonged unto their Officers; they were so unable to conceal their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw down his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himself and his Country in a new War; therefore waiting better opportunity of revenge, he quietly swallowed the contumely, and followed his main intent. Having landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treaty of peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persians should restore to liberty all the Greek Towns in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the mean while make Truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tissaphernes had sought, only to win time of making provision for the War, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes, whilst Agesilaus was busied in settling the Estates of his confederate Cities on that side side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from War, was at the coming down of these Forces which Artaxerxes had sent: at what time Agesilaus received a plain message from Tissaphernes, That either he must forthwith depart out of Asia, or make good his abode by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word, that he was glad to hear that his enemies had by perjury deserved vengeance from heaven, prepared to invade them; and sending word to all the Towns which lay between him and Caria, that they should provide victuals and other necessaries for his Army, did callily make Tissaphernes believe, that his intent was to invade that Province wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was unfit for Horse, in which part of his Forces the Persians had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his Horse into the Plains of Meander, hoping thereby to stop the passage of a heavy foot-army, not suffering them to pass into that Country which was fittest for their service. But the Greeks left him waiting there in vain, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they took great spoil without resistance, till such time as the Horsemen of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish having the better of the Greeks, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight only twelve men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiving by that trial how hard it would be to prevail, and hold the mastery of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, took all possible care to increase that part of his forces. By which means having enabled himself whilst Winter lasted, he entred upon the Country of Tissaphernes, as soon as the season of the year would permit, and not only took a great booty, but finding the Horsemen of Tissaphernes in the plain Meander, with the usual assistance of their Infantry, he gave them battel, and had a great Victory, taking their Camp, in which he found great riches. The blame of this loss fell heavy upon Tissaphernes, who either upon cowardice had absented himself from the battel, or following some other business, was then at Sardis. For which cause his Master having him in distrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which he much desired, if the man so odious to the whole Nation of the Greeks, were taken out of the way; he sent into those parts Tibranistes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and succeed him in the Government. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heaven, when by perjury he could advance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last, through too much overweening of his own wisdom, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himself most perfect; for supposing that by his great skill in subtil negotiation he should one way or other circumvent the Greeks, and make them weary of Asia; he did not seek to finish the War, and according to his Masters wish, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might find some opportunity of making such end as might best stand with the Kings honour and his own. Wherein it seems that he much mistook his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aid which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would he much more gladly have taken it, if he could have found such means whereby the danger it self might have been avoided: as not loving to have War, whilst by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtain peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tibranistes took at his first possession of the low Country. For he sent Embassadors to Agesilaus, in very friendly sort letting him know, that the man who had been author of the War, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greeks enjoy their own laws and liberty, upon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Army be forthwith dismissed. The answer to this proposition was by Agesilaus referred to the Council of Sparta; in the mean season he was content to transfer the War into the Province of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tibranistes, who bought his departure with thirty Talents.

This was a strange manner of War, both on the offensive, and the defensive part. For Agesilaus having entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbear his several Provinces, at the entreaty of the Lieutenants: and those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintain his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might easily be taken from their shoulders) were little offered at any loss that fell on their next neighbour Princes, which were subject likewise to the same Crown of Persia, so long as their own Government could be preserved from waste and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribe to nothing so deservedly as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuchs, Concubines, and ministers of pleasure, were able by partial construction, to countenance or disgrace the actions of such as had the managing of things abroad; and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so usual, that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Provincial Governour, according to the benefit or loss which the Country given in charge unto each of them received, during the time of his Rule. Whereby it came to pass, that as every one was desirous to make his own Territory yield a large increase to the Kings treasure, so no man was careful to assist his borders, if loss or danger might thereby grow to himself and his; but sat still as an idle beholder, when perhaps by joining their forces, it had not been uneasy to recompence the spoil of one Country, by conquering another, or defending a third from greater miseries.

SECT. V.

The War and Treaty between Agesilaus and Pharnabazus.

AGESILAUS having thus compounded with Tibranistes, entred Phrygia, burning and wasting the Country without resistance. He took the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant drove him out of the Camp. These actions, together with his honourable behaviour, which added much to their lustres, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not win Cities and places of strength, which might have increased his power, and given assistance to his proceedings; but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew unto him those that were discontented and stood upon bad terms with the great King; whom he lost again as easily, by means of some slight injury done to them by his under Captains. Pharnabazus did not enclose himself in any Town, for fear of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as near as he could fight to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which he found not uneasy to do. For the pleasures by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessity, had been so great, that when he (obtaining parley) did set before their eyes his bounty towards them, and his love, (which had been such, that besides many other hazards of his person, he had for the rescue of their Fleet, when it was driven to run ashore at Abydos, adventured to ride into the Seas as far as he could find any ground, and fight on Horiback against the Athenians) together with his faith which had never been violated in word or deed: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise then by telling him, That having War with his Master, they were informed against their will to offend him. Agesslaus did make a fair offer to him, that if he would revolt from the King to them, they would maintain him against the Persians, and establish him free Prince of the Country wherein he was at that time only Deputy to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make War against them, he would not fail to do the best that he could as their enemy; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then shift side, and betake himself to their alliance. The issue of this parley was, That the Army should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor again return into it, whilst employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agesslaus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not invaded for want of more necessary business elsewhere; but because his Country would yield great booty, and for the hire of thirty Talents. By this means the Lacedæmonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards required their unthankfulness with full revenge.

SECT. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with Gold from the Persian.

IN the mean while Tithraustes perceiving that Agesslaus meant nothing less than to return into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, took a wife course, whereby the City of Sparta was not only driven to look to her own, and give over her great hopes of subverting the Empire; but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late Victories, and saw her Dominion restrained unto the narrow bounds of her own Territory. He sent into War against the Lacedæmonians; which Treachery was by the subtil practice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed among the principal men of the Thebans, Argives, and Corinthians, that all those Estates having formerly born secret hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much as of open War. And left this great heat of the incensed multitude should for want of present exercise, begin to faint and vanish away in idle words, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedæmonians into Arms, that they themselves might seem Authors of the quarrel. Some land there was in the tenure of the Loricans, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claim; but the Phocians either having the better title, or finding the greater favour, had it adjudged unto them, and received yearly money for it. This money the Loricans were either hired or persuaded to pay now to the Thebans who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning to lose their Rent, made a distress by strong hand, recovering a great deal more than their own: which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) required with an invasion made upon Phocis, warring that Country in the manner of open War. Such were the beginnings of professed hostility between Thebes and Sparta, and the first breaking out of their close enmity, that had long time, though hardly, came to Sparta, concluding the violence done by the Thebans, and requesting succour, they had very favourable audience, and ready consent to their suit, it being the manner of the Lacedæmonians to defer the acknowledgment of injuries received, until occasion of revenge were offered, and then to discover their indignation in cold blood. At this time they had very good opportunity to work their own wills, having no other War to disturb them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no news that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they sent Lysander to raise all the Countries about Phocis, and with such forces as he could levy, to attend the coming of Pausanias King of Sparta, (for Sparta, as hath been shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, and being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to revolt from Thebes. Pausanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians (who refused to assist him in that enterprise) meaning to join with Lysander and make a speedy end of the War. The consideration of so great a danger, approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seek what help they could abroad, so much as their own strength was far too little to make resistance against such mighty preparations. It was not unknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were otherwise affected in heart, than their duty in conscience; but the good wishes of such people were little available, considering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should do as little hurt as they could: by which manner of tergiversation, the Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course to procure the assistance of some Estate that might presently declare it self on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, and make their party strong. To this end they sent Embassadors to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by public allowance, or done in time of the general War, and recompensed with friendship lately shewn in their refusal of assisting Pausanias, when he came in behalf of the thirty Tyrants against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their own Honour sake, they requested them of aid in the present War, offering to do the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former estate and dignity. Thrasybulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the Thebans, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the City to make a large requital of the courtesy which they had received. For it was decreed, That the State of Athens should not only refuse to aid the Lacedæmonians in this War, but that it should assist the Thebans, and engage it self in their cause. Whilst Pausanias lay still waiting the arrival of his Confederates; Lysander being desirous to do somewhat that might advance the business in hand, came to Halimarus, where, though Pausanias did not meet Town, and was slain in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this victory did encourage the Thebans, so the coming of Pausanias with his his great Army did again amaze them, with presentation of extreme danger; but their spirits were soon revived by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battle, Pausanias durst not hazard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slain by composition, departed out of their Territory, for which, either cowardice or indifferency, he was at his return to Sparta condemned as a Traytor, and driven to fly into Tegenæ, where he ended his days in banishment.

SECT. VII.

How Agesslaus was called out of Asia to help his Country. A Victory of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian assisted by Pharnabazus, overcomes the Lacedæmonian Fleet; recovers the mastery of the Seas, and rebuilds the walls of Athens.

THIS good success, and the Confederacy made with Athens, gave such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Embracians, Lacrians, and Acanians, did forthwith side with them, and raising a strong Army, determined to give battle to the Lacedæmonians as near as they might, to their own doors; considering that the force of Sparta it self was not great, but grew more and more by the adjunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agesslaus, who readily obeyed the danger, promising his friends in Asia to return speedily to their assistance, passed the freights of Hellepont into Europe. In the mean time the Cities of the new League had given battle to the Lacedæmonians, and the remainder of their Associates; but with ill success. For when the right wing of each party had gotten the better hand, the Argives and Thebans returning from the chase in some disorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left wing of the Lacedæmonians, and made the victory of that day entirely their own. The reporters of this battle meeting Agesslaus at Amphipolis, were by him sent over into Asia, wherein it is not likely that they brought much comfort unto his friend, who had since his departure seen the Spartan Fleet beaten, and Lysander the Admiral slain. The same man, whose endeavour had brought the Athenians into union with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power of the Lacedæmonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power of the Lacedæmonians grew strong at Sea, when the City was depopulated of her old reputation, and scarcely able to maintain an Army by Land for her defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it imported the King his Master, to have the Greeks divided into such factions as might utterly disable them from undertaking abroad, thought it the safest way for himself, during these broils, to take such order, that he should not need any more to seek peace by treaty and commendation of old benefits, at their hands, who unprovoked, had sold his love for thirty Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight Ships, who had escaped when the Fleet of Athens was surprized by Lysander at Argos Potamos; giving him the command of a great Navy, wherewith he recovered the loss received at Argos Potamos, by repaying the Lacedæmonians with the like destruction of their Fleet at Cnidus. After this Victory, Conon failed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his Victory, so strong a Navy, and so much Gold, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their Walls, and think more hopefully upon recovering the Seigniorship which they had lost.

SECT. VIII.

Of sundry small Victories gotten on each part. The Lacedæmonians lose all in Asia; the Athenians recover some part of their old Dominion.

NEVERTHELESS the Lacedæmonians by many Victories at Land, maintained for some years the honour of their Estate, endangered very greatly by this loss at Sea. For Agesslaus obtained the better with his horsemen from the Thebans, who were accounted the best riders in Greece. He waited Bastina, and fought a great Battle at Coronea against the Thebans and their Allies, whom he overthrew; and by his Marshal Gylis foraged the Country of Loricis: which done, he returned home.

The gain of their Victories was not great, and the reputation of them was, by many losses, much decreased. For the Thebans did in the battle of Coronea vanquish the Orchomenians, who stood opposite unto them, and retired unbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Agesslaus chased them in the return from the pursuit. Likewise Gylis was slain with a great part of his Army by the Loricans; and some other exploits by the Lacedæmonians performed against the Corinthians, were repayed with equal damage received in the parts adjoining; many Towns being easily taken, and as easily recovered. The variety of which enterprises was such, that the Thebans themselves were drawn by the loss of the Havea of Corinth, to sue for peace, but could not get audience, till such time as the news came of a great Victory obtained by Iphicrates, General of the Athenian forces at Lechæum; whereupon the Theban Embassadors being sent for, and willing to do their message, required only in scorn to have a safe conduct given them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the War was made for a while only by incursions, wherein the Athens, Confederates of Sparta, felt much loss, their whole State being endangered by the Acanians; who held with the contrary side, until Agesslaus repayed these invaders with equal, or greater calamities brought upon their own Lands, which did so afflict the Acanians, that they were driven to sue for peace. But the affairs at Sea were of more consequence, upon which the success of all depended. For when the Towns of Asia perceived that the Lacedæmonians were not only intangled in a hard War at home, but almost disabled to pals the Seas, having lost their Fleet at Cnidus; they soon gave ear to Pharnabazus, who promised to allow that they should use their own laws, if they would expel the Spartan Governors. Only the City of Abydos did stand firm, wherein Dercyllides lay, who did his best to contain all the Towns about Hellepont, in the Alliance of the Lacedæmonians; which he could not do, because the Athenian Fleet under Thrasybulus, took in Bizantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the life of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgment of Athens.

SECT. IX.

The base conditions offered unto the Persian by the Lacedæmonian. Of sundry fights and other passages in the War. The Peace of Antalcidas.

About this time the Spartans began to perceive how unsafe a thing it would be to maintain the War against men as good as themselves, assisted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craved peace of Artaxerxes, most lately offering not only to renounce the Greeks inhabiting Asia, and to leave them to the Kings disposition; but withal to fet the Islanders, and every Town in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute liberty, whereby they laid that all their principal Estates of their Country would be weakened, that no one nor all of them should be able to rise against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Country being broken and rent into many small pieces, could neither have disputed the Persian by an offensive War, nor have made any good defence against him, but would have left it ease for him in continuance of time to have taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himself Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were carried with envy, that perceiving how the dominion of the Seas was like to return to Athens, they chose rather to give all from themselves and others, and make all alike weak, than to permit that any of their own Nation should grow stronger than themselves, who so lately had conquered all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted; both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalf joined together against the Lacedæmonians, did by their several Embassadors oppose themselves unto it; and for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes rather to weaken the Lacedæmonians yet more, than by interposing himself to bring friends and foes on the sudden to an equality. Especially Struthus, whom Artaxerxes had sent as his Lieutenant unto the low Countries, did seek to repay the harm done by Asiaticus in those parts: which his intent appearing plain, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off, Timbro was sent into Asia to make War upon Struthus; and others were appointed to other places: whereby the War being scattered about, all the Isles and Towns on the firm land, grew almost to the manner of Piracy, and Robbery, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthy of remembrance. Timbro was slain by Struthus, and in his place Diphridas was sent, who demeaned himself more warily. Dercyllidas was removed from his charge at Asiaticus, because he had not impeached Thrasybulus in his enterprises about Hellaspont; Anaxibius who succeeded him, was surprized and slain in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasybulus departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was slain by the way at Aspendus. The City of Rhodes had long before joined with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Aristocracy, or the Government of a few of the principal Citizens; whereas contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Sovereignty into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselves by erecting in the Town of their Confederates a Government like unto their own: which doing (where more especial cause did not hinder) caused the Nobility to favour Sparta, and the Commons to incline to Athens. The people of Ægina roved upon the Coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Army in Ægina, and besiege their Town: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedæmonian Fleet, the Islanders began anew to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their Ships again, that returned beaten, having lost four of thirteen. The loss of these Ships was soon recompensed by a Victory which Chabrias the Athenian General had in Ægina, whereupon the Islanders were fain to keep home, and leave to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seem strange that the City of Athens, having but newly raised her Walls, having not by any fortunate and important Battle recovered her Estate from dangers by land; but only depending upon the assistance of such Confederates as carried unto different ends, had often discovered themselves irresolute in the common cause, would fend a Fleet and an Army to Cyprus, in defence of Eugorau, when the Mastery of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Island in the eye of Pyræus, had ability to vex the Coast of Attica. But as the overweening of that City did cause it usually to embrace more than it could compass; so the intolency and shameless injustice of the people, had now bred in the chief Commanders a desire to keep themselves far out of fight, and to seek employments at such distance as might secure them from the eyes of the envious, and from publick judgments, out of which few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did pass away much part of his time in the life of Leibor, Iphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Country could well have spared: with which he returned not when the business in Cyprus came to an end, but sought new adventures in Egypt, whereby arose neither thanks to himself, nor profit to his City, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus careless of things at hand, had a notable blow given unto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, even within their own Haven. For Telutius a Lacedæmonian being made Governor of Ægina, conceived a strong hope of surprizing the Navy of Athens as it lay in Piræus, thinking aright, that it was a harder matter to encounter with ten Ships prepared for the fight, than with twenty lying in harbour, whose Mariners were asleep in their Cabins, or drinking in Taverns. Wherefore he waited by night into the mouth of the Port, which entring at the break of day, he found (according to his expectation) most of the men on shore, and few or none left aboard to make resistance: by which means he took many Ships laden with Merchandizes, many fishermen, passengers, and other Vessels, also three or four Gallies; having sunk or broken, and made unrevivable, as many of the rest as time would suffer. About this time Pharabazus the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters given to him in Marriage, with whom he lived about the Court; and many Officers that favoured the Lacedæmonians, were placed in the lower Asia; by whose assistance the Fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellaspont; in such wise, that perhaps they should not have needed the peace, which they themselves procured by Antalcidas from the great King; the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before, giving freedom to all the Cities of Greece, and dividing the Country into as many several States as were petty Boroughs in it. Thus Artaxerxes having bought his own peace with money, did likewise by his money become Arbitrator and decider of Controversies between the Greeks, disposing of their business in such wise, as stood best with his own good. The tenor of Artaxerxes his Decree was, That all

Asia

Asia and Cyprus should be his own; the Isles of Lemnos, Imbros, and Scirus, be subject to Athens; all other Greek Towns, as well the little as the great, be set at liberty; and that whatsoever should refuse this peace, upon them the approvers of it it should make War, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasures. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea; the Lacedæmonians by revolt of their Confederates, and the necessity of maintaining many Gattions, for which they wanted money, and other States by the miseries of the War, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent unto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking upon themselves the execution, did not only compel the Argives to depart out of Corinth, (which under pretence of defending, they held by Gattions, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords), and the Thebans to leave Boeotia free, of which Province Thebes had always held the Government, the Thebans themselves being also comprehended under the name of the Boeotians; but caused the Mantineans to throw down their own City, and to dwell in Villages: alleging that they had formerly been accustomed to do so, though purposing indeed to chastise them, as having been ill-affected to Sparta in the late War. By these courses the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the small Towns in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their Wars, as Authors of their Liberty; and that the great Cities having lost all their dependants, would be unable to make opposition.

SECT. X.

The War which the Lacedæmonians made upon Olynthus. They take Thebes by Treason, and Olynthus by Famine.

Whilst these Wars, which ended without either victory or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the City of Olynthus in Thrace was grown so mighty, that she did not only command her neighbour Towns, but was also become terrible to places far removed, and to Sparta it self. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principal City of that Kingdom, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the usual pretence of the Lacedæmonians, to set at liberty the places over which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almost now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acanthus, and of Apollonia, being nearest unto the danger of those encroaching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedæmonians with their fear, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would be too strong for all Greece, if continuance of time should give it reputation, which only it wanted: wherefore they requested assistance, but in such terms as did found of compulsion, protesting that either they must War upon Olynthus, or become subject unto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a hasty levy of men, two thousand being sent presently away, with promise to be seconded by a greater Army. Whilst these two thousand gave such beginning to the War, as agreed with their small number, the body of the Army following them, surprized the Citadell of Thebes, which was betrayed into the hand of Phobidas the Lacedæmonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the slavery of their Country. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any point violated the peace lately made between them; which caused the Lacedæmonians to doubt, whether this act of Phobidas were more worthy of reward or of punishment. In conclusion, profit to far outweighed honesty, that the deed was approved, many principal Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driven into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the Government of the City: by whose authority, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to serve the Lacedæmonians in all, and more than all that they could require. This access of power having strengthened the Lacedæmonians, caused them to entertain the greater forces about Olynthus, (which notwithstanding the loss of one great Battle, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it self unto their obedience.

SECT. XI.

How the Thebans recovered their liberty, driving out the Lacedæmonian Garrison.

After this Olynthian War, which endured almost three years, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found a means to shake off their yoke, and gave both example and means to others to do the like. One of the banished men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, coming to Athens, that the tyranny where with his Country was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those, who for fear of it were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was laid between these two, that soon found very good success, being managed thus. Seven of the banished men forsook Athens privily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the evening to the Gates like Husbandmen returned from work, and so passed undiscovered unto the house of Charon, whom Phylidas the Scribe had drawn into the Conspiracy. The day following, a solemn Feast being then held in the City, Phylidas permitted the Governours, who were insolent and lustful men, that he would convey unto them that night the most beautiful Dames of the Town, with whom they should take their pleasure. Having cheered them with such hope, and plenty of good Wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they urged) came, that he could not make good his promise, unless they would dismiss their followers, because the Gentlemen who attended without the Chamber, would not endure that any of the servants should see their faces. Upon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators attired like Ladies, and their Maids, brought into the place; who taking advantage of the Governours loose behaviour, slew them all upon the sudden with Daggers, which they brought hidden under their Garments. Then presently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where feigning themselves to come to the Governours upon business, they got admittance, and likewise slew those which were of the Lacedæmonian faction. By the like device they brake into the Prison, slew the Cooler, and set at liberty such as they thought meet; and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed liberty, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captain of the Castle hearing the sudden Proclamation, thought the Rebels to be stronger than

indeed they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a practice to discover such as would be forward upon occasion of revolting. But as soon as day-light revealed the plain truth, all the people took Arms and besieged the Castle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aid unto the Towns adjoining, whence a few broken Troops coming to the rescue, were defeated on the way by the horsemen of Thebes. On the other side, the banished Thebans did not only make speed to assist their Countrymen, but procured some Athenians to join with them, and thereby came to strong into the City, that the Castle was yielded, more through fear than any necessity, upon condition that the Soldiers might quietly depart with their Arms; for which composition, the Captain at his return to Sparta was put to death. When the news of the doings at Thebes, and the success arrived at Sparta, an Army was raised forthwith, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recovering of that City, as if some part of their ancient Inheritance had been taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a Town perfidiously usurped by them, restored to her own liberty. Cleombrotus one of the Kings, was sent on this Expedition Winters journey, who having wearied his followers with any good or harm done; leaving Sphodrias with part of his Army, at Thebes, to insult the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt upon the Haven of Athens; which failing to take, he wasted the Country adjoining, and drove away Cattel, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the War, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how they might possibly withdraw themselves.

SECT. I.

How Thebes and Athens joined together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The Battel of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatness.

THE Lacedæmonians were men of great resolution, and of much gravity in all their proceedings; but one dishonourable Rule they held, That all respects withstanding the commodity of Sparta, were to be neglected; the practice of which Doctrine, even by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blench that Estate: but when it was put in execution by insufficient overweening men, it seldom failed to bring upon them, instead of profit unjustly expected, both shame and loss. And so it befall them in their enterprizes of Ptochidas, upon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias upon the Piræus. For howsoever Agesilaus did spoil the Country about Thebes, in which he spent two Summers; yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good success of some attempts grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise began to look abroad, failing to the life of Coreysa, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and having in some fights at Sea prevailed, began as in the Peloponnesian War, to surround Peloponnesus with a Navy; afflicting to the Lacedæmonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolvency wearied their friends, and caused them to seek for peace, it had been very likely that the end of this War should have soon come to a good end, which nevertheless being prosecuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both their two great Estates) left the City of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginnings found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroached every day upon her weak Neighbours, not sparing such as had been dependants upon Athens, and finding themselves, while engaged in such a War, unable to relieve their complaining friends, resolved to settle the affairs of Greece, by renewing that form of peace which Amalcidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, That it was their intent to finish the War, to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta; who readily confederated, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treaty of Peace: which came to pass, being wrought by the courageous wisdom of Epaminondas, who understood it far better than his Countrymen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treaty the Lacedæmonians and Athenians did soon agree; but when the Thebans offered to swear to the Articles in the name of the Boeotians, Agesilaus required them to swear in their own name, and to leave the Boeotians free, whom they had lately reduced under their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answer, That the City of Sparta should give example to Thebes by letting the Boeotians free; for that the Seignior of Boeotia did by as good right appertain to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly spoken; but was heard with no patience: for Agesilaus bearing a vehement hatred unto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawn back out of Africa into Greece, and disappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to achieve by the Persian War, did now passionately urge that point of letting the Boeotians at liberty; and finding it as obstinately refused, he dashed the name of the Thebans out of the League. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocia, who received command from the Governours of Sparta forthwith to enter upon the Land of the Thebans with all his power; which he did, and was there slain at Leuctra, and with him him the flower of his Army. This Battel of Leuctra being one of the most famous that ever were fought between the Greeks, was not so notable for any circumstance foregoing it, or for the managing of the fight itself, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta; but especially, for that after this Battel (between which and the conclusion of the general Peace, there passed but twenty days) the Lacedæmonians were never able to recover the strength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted far and near: whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had in former times confined it self unto the little Region of Boeotia, did now begin to undertake the leading and command of many People and Estates, in such wise, that soon after they brought an Army of three thousand and ten thousand strong into the Gates of Sparta. So much do the afflictions of an hard War, valiantly endured, advance the affairs of the distressed, and guide them into the way of conquest, by flattening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxury, wretchedness, and many other vices or vanities, made rusty and effeminate.

SECT. II.

How the Athenians took upon them to maintain the Peace of Greece. New troubles hence arising. Epaminondas invadeth and wasteth the Territory of Lacedæmon.

THE Athenians refusing to take advantage of this overthrow slain upon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedæmonians, did nevertheless finally give them to understand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking upon themselves the maintenance of the Peace lately concluded, which Agesilaus (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrels that might arise) had left imperfect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens; where the general liberty of all Towns, as well small as great, was ratified under the stile of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hercules began fresh garbils. The Mantinians, claiming power by this Decree to order their affairs at their own pleasure (as it were) in despite of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their Town, re-edify it, and allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as flood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondence with the Lacedæmonians; some to weaken and keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedæmonians durst not give impeachment to the Mantinians, nor take upon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions broke out into violence, and each party called in foreign help. Then was an Army sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegea, against the Mantinians, but indeed against them both. Agesilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the Phocians, and were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubœans, and many others; with the power of which Countrys they entered Peloponnesus in favour of the Arcadians, who gave upon expectation of their coming, abstained from giving Battel to Agesilaus. The Army of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas joined with the Arcadians, the Region of Laconia was invaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could have found belief if any had foretold it. Almost 600 years were spent, since the Dorians under the posterity of Hercules had seized upon Laconia; in all which time the bound of an Enemies Trumpet was not heard in that Country. Ten years were not fully past, since all Greece was at the devotion of the Spartans: but now the Region which neither Xerxes with his huge Army could once look upon, nor the mighty forces of Athens, and other enemy-States had dared to set foot on, saving by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoke whereof the Women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignity notwithstanding, the Lacedæmonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preserve the Town, letting at liberty as many of their Helotes, or slaves, as were willing to bear Arms in defence of the State, and somewhat pitifully entreated the Athenians, to give them succour. From Corinth, and some Towns of Peloponnesus, they received speedy assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, to that Epaminondas returned without battel, having rebuked the City of Messene, and peopled it anew by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedæmonians many ages before had chased away to other Countrys, possessing their Territories themselves.

SECT. III.

The Composition between Athens and Sparta for command in War against the Thebans, who again invade and spoil Peloponnesus. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

THIS journey therefore utterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, which was to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held League with it, unto Athens, they offered to yield the Admiralty to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generals by Land. This had been a composition well agreeing with the situation and quality of those two Cities, but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be employed at Sea, were men of no mark or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot, whereof the Land-Army was compounded; who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to have served under the Lacedæmonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the Authority should be divided by time, the Athenians ruling five days, the Lacedæmonians other five, and so successively that each of them should have command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion, vain ambition was more regarded than the common profit, which must of necessity be very slowly advanced, where consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second invasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so unable to impeach them, that having fortified Isthmus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driven out of their strength by Epaminondas, who foraged the Country without resistance. But as the Articles of this League between Athens and Sparta did, by dividing the conduct in such manner, disable the Society, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; to the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanity. For the Arcadians considering their own numbers which they brought into the field, and having found by many trials that their people were not inferior to others in strength of body, in courage, or in good Soldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the Government with their friends the Thebans; and not always continue followers of others, by increasing whose greatness they should strengthen their own yoke. Hereupon they began to demean themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hateful to their Neighbours, and suspected of the Thebans in all time. For a motion of general peace having been made (which took not effect, because the City Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedæmonians) the next enterprize of the Spartans and their friends was upon these Arcadians, who relying too much upon their own worth, were overthrown in a great battle, their calamity being as pleasing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

SECT. IV.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greeks to the Persian; with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitless issue of the Embassages.

THE Thebans especially rejoiced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering that without their aid, the success of all enterprizes proved to ill; whereas they themselves had by their own power accomplished very well whatever they took in hand, and were become not only victorious over the Lacedæmonians, but Patrons over the Theffalians, and moderators of great quarrels that had risen in Macedonia; where compounding the differences about that Kingdom, as pleaded them best, they carried Philip the son of Amyntas, and father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage unto Thebes. Having therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought means of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Ambassador the great and famous Captain Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant unto the Thebans all that they desired, whereof two especial points were, that Messene should remain free from the Lacedæmonians, and that the Athenians should forbear to send their ships of War to Sea; only the latter of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further advice. The other States of Greece did also send their Ambassadors at the same time, of whom few or none received much contentment. For the King having round by long experience, how far it concerned him to maintain a sure party in Greece, did upon many mighty considerations resolve to bind the Thebans firmly unto him; justly expecting that their greatness should be an that side his own security. The Athenians had been ancient Enemies to his Crown; and having turned the profit of their victories upon the Persians to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signiory in such puissant manner, that (sundry grievous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible War, wherein the Lacedæmonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aid by Darius Nobis, were not able to vanquish them till their own misdeeds brought them on their knees. The Lacedæmonians being victorious over Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertook the conquest of Asia, from which though by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian Gold, they were called back; yet having renewed their power, and sealed all things in Greece; it was not unlikely that they should rise upon the next advantage have pursued the same enterprize, had not they been impeached by this Theban War. But the Thebans contrariwise had always discovered a good affection to the Crown of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his invasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedæmonians against Athens: And finally, having offered much contumely to Agaglan when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making War on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good servings, they were no Seamen, and therefore unlikely to look abroad, whereupon if perchance they should have any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good Haven-Towns; which they could not seize upon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giving liberty to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend unto the requests of Pelopidas, as far forth as he might, without giving open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that mean he purchased his own quiet, being never afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill means which the Greeks had to disturb Artaxerxes was very beneficial to the Estate of Persia shortly after this time, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Provinces. For had then the affairs of Greece been so composed, that any one City might without impeachment of the rest have transported an Army to assist the revolting Sarraps, or Vice-roys of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Campylia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phoenicia; humane reason can hardly find the means, by which the Empire could have been preserved from that ruin, which the Divine Council had deferred unto the days of Alexander. But this great Conspiracy of so many large and wealthy Provinces, wanting a firm body of good and hardy Soldiers, was in short space dissolved, and vanished like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiatics, wearied quickly with the travels and dangers incident to War, forsaking the common cause, and each man striving to be the first, that by treason to his company should both redeem the former treason to his Prince, and purchase with his own promotion with increase of riches. Of this commotion which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I have rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interpret the Narration of things more important; but for that it was like a sudden storm, rashly commenced, idly followed, and foolishly laid down, having made a great noise without effect, and having small reference to any other action agreeable; as also because in the whole reign of Artaxerxes, from the War of Cyru to the invasion of Egypt, I find nothing (this infurrection, and a fruitless journey against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention, much less of digression from the course of the business in Greece. All, or the most of his time passed away to quietly, that he enjoyed the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could afford unto such an absolute Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were only, or chiefly Domestical; growing out of the hatred which Parysatis the Queen-Mother bare unto his Wife Statira, and to such as had been the greatest enemies to her Son Cyru, or gloried in his death: upon whom, when by poison and malicious practices he had satisfied her feminine appetite of revenge, thenceforth forth the wholly applied her self to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the leud desire of marrying his own Daughter, and filling him with the perversion which Princes not endued with an especial grace, do readily entertain: That his own will would be the supreme law of his subjects, and the rule, by which all things were to be measured and adjudged to be good or evil. In this imaginary happiness Pelopidas, and the other Ambassadors of Greece, both found and left him; but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of this Treaty with them, being altogether to his own advantage, did seem to promise, if not the perpetuity, a long endurance of the same felicity to him and his, or (at the least) a full security of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternity laid by mortal men in this transitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heaven, or made vain and unprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece that had sent Ambassadors to the Persian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Towns, as well the little as the great, should be left at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Judges of all Controversies that might arise, and Leaders in War of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings Letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Ambassadors drawn thither from all parts of Greece: when an Oath was required for observation of the form of peace therein set down, a dilatory answer was made by the Ambassadors, who said, that they were sent to hear the articles, not to swear unto them. Hereby the Thebans were driven to send unto each of the Cities to require the Oath; but in vain. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, that they did not need it; others took courage by their example to do the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gave neither addition nor confirmation of greatness, but left them as it found them to rely upon their own swords.

SECT. V.

How all Greece was divided between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumult arising in Arcadia.

THE condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus: Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each upon envy of the others greatness, drawn all their followers into a cruel and intestine War, by which the whole Country, and especially the Estates of these two Cities was brought very low, did now conjoin their forces against the Thebans, who fought to make themselves Lords of all. The Elcans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the party of these ancient Governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, and benefits received, or in dislike of those, who by strong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which authority they could not suddenly assent without some injury and much envy. The City of Thebes abounding with men, whom necessity had made warlike, and many Victories in few years had filled with great spirits; and being so mighty independent, that he had reduced all the Continent of Greece without Peloponnesus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beside, excepted) under such acknowledgment as wanted not much of meer Vassalage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already he had let good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argives had been always bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobility superiors, but were far under them in valour, having been often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of losing all; which caused them to suspect and envy nothing more than the greatness and honour of Sparta, taking Truce with her when she was at rest, and had leisure to bend her whole force against them; but firmly joining with her enemies whensoever they found her entangled in a difficult War. As the Argives were, in hatred of Sparta, sure friends of the Thebes, so the Arcadians transported with a great opinion of their own worthiness, had formerly renounced and provoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedæmonians, and were now become very doubtful adherents to the Thebans. In which regard, it was thought convenient by Epanimachos and the State of Thebes, to send an Army into Peloponnesus, before such time as these wavering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutral, or which was to be feared, open enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens, which was very strange, and seemed no less to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firm League with Sparta at the same time when the Arcadians treated with them, did nevertheless assert this new Confederacy, not relinquishing the old, because they found that howsoever these Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedæmonians, they should hereby be drawn somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was unlikely to invade Peloponnesus with a strong Army. But this did rather hinder, than by any means stay the coming of Epanimachos; who finding the way somewhat more clear for him (because the City of Corinth, which lay upon the Isthmus, and had been adverse to Thebes, was now by miseries of the previous War, driven to become Neutral) took occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Army, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Arcadia about confederate money, which many principal men among them had laid hands on, under pretence of employing it to publick uses. In compounding the differences grown upon this occasion, such as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captains of some Theban Soldiers lying in Tegen, to take prisoners many of their Countrymen, as people desirous of innovation. This was done, but the uproar thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forthwith enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Arms, with much ado scarce pacified. When complaint of the Captains proceedings came to Thebes, Epanimachos turned all the blame upon them who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them to judge of their fidelity, by the assistance which they should give him in that War which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aid of so mighty a power as he drew along with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to be made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before thought means to settle the affairs of their Country, by drawing things to some good conclusion of peace, did not forthwith send to Athena for help; but immediately dispatched some of the principal among them as Embassadors to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now ready to be invaded. This Embassy brought much comfort to the Lacedæmonians, who feared nothing more than the coming of Epaminondas against them; they well knew, that all their forces and best provisions would be no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about Privileges, they (who had been accustomed unto such a Supremacy, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerful City of Athena, till other hope of securing their own State could not be thought upon) did now very gently yield to the Archadians, that the command of the Army in chief should be given for the time to that City in whole Territory it lay.

SECT. VI.

A terrible Invasion of Peloponnesus by Epaminondas.

Certain it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firm confent, and uniform care of the common safety. For beside the great forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives and Messenians prepared with all their strength to join with Epaminondas; who having lain a while at Nemea to intercept the Athenians, received their intelligence, that the Army coming from Athena would pass by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegæa, which City, and the most of all Arcadia besides, forthwith declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be upon such of the Archadians as had revolted; which caused the Lacedæmonian Captains to fortifie Mantineæ with all diligence, and to send for Agésilæus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men which remained in the Town, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held to good capital upon his Enemies, that had not an unknown fellow brought halcy advertisement of his purpose to Agésilæus, who was then well onward in the way to Mantineæ, the City of Sparta had suddenly been taken. For thither with all speed and secrecy did the Theban march, who had luredly carried the City, notwithstanding any defence that could have been made by that handful of men remaining within it, but that Agésilæus in all flying-haste got into it with his Companies, whom the Army of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast it was able. The arrival of the Lacedæmonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Mantineæ, so it presented him with a fair advantage upon Mantineæ. It was the time of Harvest, which made it very likely, that the Mantineans finding the War to be carried from their Walls into another quarter, would use the commodity of that vacation, by fetching in their Corn, and turning out their Cattel into the fields, whilst no enemy was near that might impeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Mantineæ, sending his horsemen before him, to seize upon all that might be found without the City. The Mantineans according to the expectation of Epaminondas were scattered abroad in the Country, far more intent upon their Harvest-busines, than upon the War, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselves out of distance. By which presumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattel, being unable to recover the Town, were in a desperate case; and the Town it self in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy should have taken all their provision of victuals, with so many of the people as had not overtly been redeemed, by that City returning to society with Thebes. But at the same time the Athenians coming to the succour of their Confederates, whom they thought to have found at Mantineæ were very earnestly entreated by the Citizens to rescue their goods and people from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any courageous adventure to deliver those who otherwise were given as lost. The Thebans were known at that time to be the best Soldiers of all the Greeks, and the commendation of good Horsemanship had always been given to the Thessalians, as excelling in that quality all other Nations; yet the regard of honour so wrought upon the Athenians, that into this War upon no necessity of her own, but only in desire of relieving her distressed friend, they issued forth of Mantineæ, not abiding so long as to refresh themselves, or their Horses with meat; and giving a lusty charge upon the enemy, who as bravely received them, after a long and hot fight, they remained Masters of the field, giving by this Victory a safe and easy retreat to all that were without the Walls. The whole power of the Bæotians arrived in the place soon after this Battel, whom the Lacedæmonians and their Alliants were not far behind.

SECT. VII.

Epaminondas considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprizing Sparta and Mantineæ having failed, the impression of terror which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians would soon vanquish, unless by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, and leave some memorable character of his Expedition, resolved to give them Battel, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtful affections of his own Associates, and to leave the Spartans as weak in spirit and ability as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that Battel, wherein Victory should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacrity of his Soldiers to be such as promised the accomplishment of his own desire; he made shew of declining the enemy, and trenching himself in a place of more advantage, that so by taking them at all expectation of fighting that day, he might ally the heat of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when he should come upon them unexpected. This opinion deceived him not. For with very much tumult, as in to great and sudden a danger, the enemy ran to Arms, necessity enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that days service, urging them to do as well as they might. The Theban Army consisted of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lacedæmonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (because the War was in their Country) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedæmonians, the Athenians had the left wing; the Acheans, Eleans, and others

others of less account filled the body of the Army. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their own Battel, opposite to the Lacedæmonians, having by them the Archadians, the Eubæans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Messenians, and Thessalians, with others, compounding the main Battel; the Argives held the right wings, the horsemen on each part were placed in the flanks, only a troop of the Eleans were in the rear. Before the footmen could join, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, when finally the Thebans prevailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: who not yielding to the enemy either in courage or skill, were overlaid with numbers, and to be beaten upon by Thessalians flings, that they were driven to forsake the place, and leave their Infantry naked. But this retreat was the less disgraceful, because they kept themselves together, and did not fall back upon their own footmen; but finding the Theban horse to have given them over, and withal discovering some Companies of foot which had been sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their Battel in the rear, they brake upon them, routed them, and bowed them all in pieces. In the mean season the Battel of the Athenians had not only to do with the Argives, but was hardly pressed by the Theban horsemen, in such wise that it began to open, and was ready to turn back, when the Elean Squadron of horse came up to the relief of it, and reformed all on that part. With far greater violence did the Lacedæmonians and Thebans meet, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour; so that equal courage, and equal loss on both sides made the hope and appearance of Victory to either equally doubtful: unless perhaps the Lacedæmonians being very firm abiders, might seem the more likely to prevail, as having born the first brunt and fury of the onset, which was not hiserto remedy; and being framed by discipline, as it were by nature, to excel in patience, whereof the Thebans by practice of a few years, cannot be thought to have gotten a habit so sure and general. But Epaminondas perceiving the obdurate stiffness of the Enemies to be such, as neither the bad success of their own horse, nor all the force of the Bæotian Army, could abate so far, as to make them give one foot of ground; taking a choice company of the most able men, whom he cast into the form of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the advantage of that figure against a Squadron, and by his own exceeding virtue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their ranks, and cleave the whole Battel in despite of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who may justly be said to have carried the Victory, seeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereon the Battel was fought, having driven the Enemy to lodge farther off. For that which was alleged by the Athenians, as a token that the Victory was partly theirs, the slaughter of those Mercenaries upon whom they lighted by chance in their own flight, finding them behind their Army, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was a ceremony regardable only among the Greeks, and served merely for ostentation, shewing that by the fight they had obtained more what, which the enemy could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arrived at the general immediate end of the Battel; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is exprest from them, who forsook the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for trial of their ability and prowess. This was the last work of the incomparable virtue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troop of men, which broke the Lacedæmonians Squadron, and forced it to give back in disorder, was furiously charged on the sudden by a desperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, he nevertheless with a singular courage maintained the fight, using against the enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his own body; till at length by a Spartan called Anticrates, he received so violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the iron and piece of the truncheon in his breast. Hereupon he sunk down, and was soon conveyed out of the fight by his friends, having by his fall somewhat animated the Spartans (who saw would have got his body); but much more inflamed with revengeful indignation, the Thebans who raging at his heavy mischances, did with great slaughter compel their disordered enemies to leave the field; though long they followed not the chase, being wearied more with the sadness of this disaster, than with all the travel of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Physicians, that when the head of the Dart should be drawn out of his body, he must needs die. Hearing this, he called for his shield, which to have lost, was held a great dishonour: It was brought unto him. He bade them tell him, which part had the Victory; answer was made, that the Bæotians had won the field. Then said he, It is a fair time for me to die; and withal sent for Iolida and Diaphantos, two principal men of War, that were both slain: which being told him, he advised the Thebans to make peace, whilst with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a General. Herewithal he willed, that the head of the weapon should be drawn out of his body, comforting his friends that lamented his death, and went of issue, by telling them, that the Victories of Leuctra and Mantineæ were two fair daughters, in whom his memory should live.

So died Epaminondas, the worthiest man that ever was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Country: for he equalled all others in the several Virtues, which in each of them were singular. His Justice and Sincerity, his Temperance, Wisdom, and high Magnanimity, were no way inferior to his Military virtue; in every part whereof he excelled, that he could not properly be called a War, a Valiant, a Politick, a Bountifull, or an Industrious, and a Provident Captain. Neither was his private Conversation unanswerable to those high parts, which gave him praise abroad. For he was Grave, and yet very Affable and Courteous; resolute in publick business; but in his own particular case, and of much mildness: a lover of his people, bearing with mens infirmities; witty and pleasant in speech, far from insolence. Master of his own affections, and furnished with all qualities that might win and keep love. To these graces were added great ability of body, and much Eloquence, and very deep knowledge in all parts of Philosophy and Learning, wherewith his mind being enlightened, rested not in the sweetness of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects, as gave unto Thebes, which had evermore been an underling, a dreadful reputation among all people adjoining, and the highest command in Greece.

SECT. VIII.

Of the Peace concluded in Greece after the Batel of Mantinea. The Voyage of Agefilau into Egypt. His death and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made between him and Pompey the Roman.

This Battel of Mantinea was the greatest that had ever been fought in that Country between the Naturals, and the Iust. For at Marathon and Plataea, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gave rather a great fame, than a hard trial to the Græcian Valour; neither were the practice of Arms and Art Military so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian War, as long continuance, and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted which were undertaken against foreign enemies, proving for the most part unfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interessed, which never had more able Soldiers and brave Commanders, nor ever contended for Victory with greater care of the success, or more obstinate resolution. All which notwithstanding, the issue being such as hath been related, it was found best for every particular Estate, that a general Peace should be established, every one retaining what he presently had, and none being forced to depend upon another. The Messenians were by name comprized in this new League; which caused the Lacedæmonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindered not the rest from proceeding to conclusion, considering that Sparta was now too weak to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to shew that anger in Ceremonies, which had no power to declare itself in execution. This peace, as it gave some breath and refreshing to all the Country, so to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it afforded leisure to seek after wealth by foreign employment in Egypt, whither Agefilau was sent with some small Forces to assist, or indeed as a Mercenary, to serve under Tachos King of Egypt in his War upon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded under Acoris King of Egypt, went now as a Voluntary, with such Forces as he could raise by entreaty, and offer of good pay, to the same service. These Egyptian Kings descended from Amysæus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius Nathus, having retained the Country notwithstanding all intestine dissensions, and foreign invasions, during three Generations of their own race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greeks, that by their help (easily procured with Gold) they conceived great hope, not only to assure themselves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adjoining, which were held by the Persians. What the issue of this great enterprize might have been, had it not fallen by Domestic Rebellion, it is uncertain. But very likely it is, that the Rebellion itself had soon come to nothing, if Agefilau had not proved a false Traitor, joining with Nectanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebel with that Army which the money of Tachos had waged. This fallhood Agefilau excused, as tending to the good of his own Country, though it seem rather, that he grudged because the King took upon himself the conduct of the Army, using his service only as appointed the General. Howsoever it came to pass, Tachos being shamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had reposed his chief confidence, fled unto the Phrygians, upon whose submission gave him gentle entertainment; and Nectanebus (who seems to have been the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set up another King; to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yielded their obedience. But Agefilau fighting with him in places of advantage, prevailed so far, that he left Nectanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdom; who in recompence of his Treason to the former King Tachos, and good service done to himself, rewarded him with 230 Talents of Silver; with which booty sailing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate and valiant, and a good Leader in War, free from Covetousness, and not reproached with any blemish of lust; which praises are the less admirable in him, for that the Discipline of Sparta was such as did endure every one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent stream of an ill nature) with all, or the chief of these good qualities. He was nevertheless very arrogant, perverse, unjust and vain-glorious, measuring all things by his own will, and obstinately prosecuting those courses, whose ends were beyond hope. The Expedition of Xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be overthrown; with which conceit being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thians and their Allies, as compelled that Estate by meer necessity to grow warlike, and able, so the utter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable loss of all her former greatness. The commendations given to him by Xenophon his good friend, have caused Plutarch to lay his name in the balance against Pompey the great; whose actions (the solemn gravity of carriage excepted) are very disproportionate. Yet we may truly say, that as Pompey made great Wars under sundry Climates, and in all the Provinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of employments all that were before him; so Agefilau had at one time or other some quarrel with every Town in Greece, had made a War in Asia, and meddled in the business of the Egyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predecessors: yet not winning any Country, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey never took. Herein also they were very like; Each of them was the last great Captain which his Nation brought forth in time of Liberty, and each of them ruined the Liberty of his Country by his own Lordly wilfulness. We may therefore well say, Similia magis omnia quam paria; the resemblance was nearer than the equality. Indeed the freedom of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cæsar, whom he had enforced to take Arms; yet the Roman Empire stood, the form of Government only being changed: But the Liberty of Greece, or Sparta itself, was not forfeited unto the Thians, whom Agefilau had compelled to enter into a Victorious War; yet the Signiory, and ancient renown of Sparta was presently lost; and the freedom of all Greece being wounded in the Thian War, and after much blood lost, ill healed by the Peace ensuing, did very soon upon the death of Agefilau give up the ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Country was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the Contemporary passages of things, in any other Nation.

CHAP. I.

Of Philip the Father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon,

SECT. I.

What Kings Reigned in Macedon before Philip.

HE Greeks of whom we have already made large discourse, not as yet wearied with intestine War, nor made wise by their vain contention for superiority, do still, as in former times, continue the invasion and valuation of each other.

Against Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the World, they defended their liberty, with as happy success as ever Nation had, and with no less honour, than hath ever been acquired by deeds of Arms. And having had a trial and experience more than fortunate, against those Nations, they so little regarded what might come from them, who had so often forfeited the reputation of their Forces, as whatsoever could be spared from their own distraction at home, they transported over the Hellespont, as sufficient, to entertain and buffet them withal.

But, as it commonly falleth out with every man of mark in the world, that they undercal, and perish by the hands and harms which they least fear, so fared it at this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speak) they had so little regard, as they grew even then more violent in devouring each other, when the fast-growing greatness of such a Neighbour-King should, in regard of their own safety, have served them for a strong argument of union and accord. But the glory of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampered and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which fate never them, than they did, had in the time of Amysæus, the Father of Philip, so much weakened them, and won upon them, that they were not (as the Greeks persuaded themselves) in any one Age, likely to recover their own, much less to work any wonders against their borders. And indeed, it was not in their Philosophy to consider, sider, That all great alterations, are, from like, sudden and violent; and that it is then over-late to repair the decayed and broken banks, when great rivers are once swollen, tall-running, and enraged. No, the Greek did rather employ themselves, in breaking down those detences which flood between them and this inundation, than seek to rampire and re-enforce their own fields, which by the Level of reason they might have found to have lain under it. It was therefore well concluded by Orisus: Græci Civitates imperare strepula expoint, imperium omnes perdidere, The Cities of Greece left their command, by striving each of them to command all.

The Kingdom of Macedonia, so called of Macedonia the son of Orisus, as other Authors affirm, of Jupiter and Athra, is the next Region towards the North, which bordereth Greece. It hath to the East, the Aegean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west by Thessaly and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the family of Temene, of the race of Erechder, and by Nation Argives; who are listed as follows. About some six years after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Ambassadors governing Media: Caranus of dress, commanded by an Oracle to lead a Colony into Macedonia, departed thence with many people; and as he was marching through that Country, the weather being rainy and tempestuous, he espied a great herd of Goats, which fled the storms fast as they could, halting them to their known place of covert.

Whereupon Caranus, calling to mind, that he had also by another Oracle been directed to follow the first troop of Beasts, that should either lead him, or flee before him; he pursued these Goats to the Gates of Edessa, and being undisturbed by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darkness of the Air, he entered their City without resistance, and possessed it. Soon after this, by the overthrow of Cissus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedonia and held it eight and twenty years. Caranus succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelve years. Tyrinus followed Caranus and ruled eight and twenty years.

Perdicæus the sixth, the son of Tyrinus governed one and fifty years: a Prince for his great valour and many other virtues, much renowned, Solimus, Ilmy, Jodine, Eusebius, Theophilus, Antiochus, and others affirm, that he appointed a place of burial for himself, and for all the Kings of Macedonia his Successors, at Aegæ, assuring them that the Kingdom should so long continue in his Line and Race, as they continued to bury their bodies in that Sepulchre: wherein it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the posterity of the Temeneus failed in him: a thing rather devised after the effect, as I conceive, than foretold by Perdicæus.

Argent succeeded unto Perdicæus, and ruled eight and twenty years.

Philip the first, his successor, reigned eight and twenty years.

Æropus followed Philip, and governed six and twenty years: in whose infancy the Illyrians invaded Macedonia, and having obtained a great victory, they pursued the same to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians gathering new forces, and resolving either to recover their former loss or to lose at once both their Kingdom and their King, they carried him with them in his cradle into the field, and returned victorious: for they were either confident that their Nation could not be beaten, (their King being present) or rather they perceived themselves, that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their natural Lord, being an Infant, and no way (but by the hands of his servants) able to defend himself from destruction. The like is reported by Ammonius of Clotarius the son of Erechdenda.

Alcetas succeeded Æropus, and ruled nine and twenty years.

Amyntas the first, succeeded Alcetas, and reigned fifty years: He lived at such time as Darius Hystaspes, after his unprosperous return out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Army into Europe, who in Darius name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Suprem Lord, by yielding unto him Earth and Water. But his Ambassadors, as you have heard before, were for their infant behaviour toward the Macedonian Ladies, slain by the direction of Alexander, who was the son of Amyntas, and his Successor.

Alexander first made the Rich, the son of Amyntas, governed Macedonia three and forty years. He did not only appease the wrath of Megabazus, for the slaughter of the Persian Ambassadors by giving Gyges his Sister, to Babares of the blood of Persia; but by that match he grew so great in Xerxes his Grace, as he obtained all that Region between the Mountains of Olympus and Helmus, to be united to the Kingdom of Macedonia. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greeks. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardonius made General of the Persian Army: Alexander acquainted the Greeks with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three sons, Perdicæus, Alcetas and Philip.

Perdicæus the second, the son of Alexander, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian War, and reigned in all eight and twenty years. The wars which he made were not much remarkable: the Story of them is found here and there by pieces in Thucydides his first six Books. He left behind him two sons, Perdicæus, who was very young; and Archelaus, who was hale-born.

Perdicæus the third, being delivered to the custody and care of Archelaus, was at seven years of age cast into a well and drowned by his false Guardian, who excusing this Fact to Cleopatra the Mother of the young King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily, fell therewith by misadventure. But Archelaus stayed not here: for having thus dispatched his Brother, he slew both his Uncle Alcetas the son of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the son of this Alcetas, his Cousin German, and enjoyed the Kingdom of Macedonia four and twenty years.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though he made himself King of Aegæ by wicked murder, yet performed many things right greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, that he fought by all means to draw Socrates unto him, and that he greatly loved and honoured Eurydice the Tragedian. He had two Sons, Archelaus and Orisus.

Archelaus the second succeeded his Father: and having reigned seven years, he was slain in hunting, either by chance, or of purpose, by Cræteus.

Orisus his younger son was committed to the education of Æropus of the Royal blood of Macedonia, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupil, for Æropus murdered him, and usurped the Kingdom, which he held some six years: the same who denied passage to Agesslaus King of Sparta, who desired, after his return from the Asian expedition to pass by the way of Macedonia into Greece.

This

This Usurper left three sons, Panfanius, Argens, and Alexander. Panfanius succeeded his Father Æropus, and having reigned one year, he was driven out by Amyntas the son of Philip, the son of the first Perdicæus, the son of Alexander the Rich, which Philip was then preferred, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his Brother Perdicæus; his Uncle Alcetas, and his son Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very unquietly) four and twenty years: for he was not only instigated by Panfanius, abetted by the Thracians, and by his Brother Argens, encouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argens, for two years possessor of Macedonia; but on the other side, the Olympians, his Neighbours near the Aegean Sea, made themselves for a while Masters of Pella, the chief City of Macedonia.

Amyntas the second, had by his wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three sons: Alexander the second, Perdicæus the third, and Philip the second: Father of Alexander the Great: and one Daughter called Euryone, or Exione. He had also by his second wife Gyges, three sons; Archelaus, Argens, and Menelaus, afterward slain by their Brother Philip. He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomy first named Alorites, of the City of Alorus, wherein he was born.

Alexander the second reigned not much above one year, in which time he was invaded by Panfanius, the son of Æropus, but defended by Iphicrates Alexander, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great sum of money) to leave his youngest Brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subjected his Father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander being invited by the Alveads against Alexander the Tyrant of Phères in Thessaly, having redeemed his brother Philip, to draw the Thebans to his assistance, entered into confederacy with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Country, with whom he also left Philip with divers other principal persons. For the sake of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his Mother falling in love with her Son in Law, who had married her Daughter Euryone, or Exione, practised the death of Alexander her son, with a purpose to confer the Kingdom on her Paramour, which Ptolomy Alorites did put in execution: by means whereof, he held Macedonia for three years, but was soon after slain by Perdicæus the brother of Alexander. Thence hath it otherwise of Philip being made pledges and faith. That Amyntas his Father delivered him for hostage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conveyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip while his Father was yet living, was first ingaged to the Thebans, and delivered for hostage a second time by Alexander his brother.

Perdicæus the third, after he had slain Alorites, his base Brother, governed Macedonia five years, and was then slain in a Battle against the Illyrians, according to Diomedes; but Justin affirmeth, that he perished by the practice of Eurydice his Mother, as Alexander did.

SECT. II.

The beginning of Philip's Reign, and how he delivered Macedonia from the troubles wherein he found it intangled.

Philip the second, the youngest son of Amyntas by Eurydice, having been instructed in all knowledge, requisite unto the Government of a King.

dom, in that excellent education which he had under Epaminondas, making an escape from Thebes, returned into Macedonia, in the first year of the hundred and fifth Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourscore and thirteen years; and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdom was inviolated, he took on him, not as a King (for Perdicæus left a son, though but an Infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of War. Yet his trisul ambition soon over-grew his modesty, and he was easily persuaded by the people to accept both the title of King, and woe, the absolute rule of the Kingdom. And to say the truth, the necessity of the State of Macedonia at that time required a King both prudent and active. For, besides the incursions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did set up in opposition, Panfanius, the Athenians, Argens, son of the late Usurper, Æropus: each of these labouring to place in Macedonia a King of their own election. These heavy burdens when Philip could not well bear, he bought off the weightiest by money, and by fair promises unloaded himself of so many of the rest, as he ran under the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his Brother Perdicæus had his death accompanied with four thousand Macedonians, beside those that were wounded and taken prisoners, and that the Pannonians were destroying all before them in Macedonia, and that the Athenians with a Fleet by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land under Mantias, did beat upon him on all sides and quarters of his Country: yet after he had practised the men of War of Pannonia, and corrupted them with gifts; and had also bought the King of Thrace from Panfanius, he forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest enemies; and for the first, he prevented their recovery of Amphipolis, a City on the Frontier of Macedonia; and did then pursue Argens, the son of Æropus, set against him to abide the battle, and followed him so hard at the heels, in his retreat from Ægæ, that he forced him to the siege of the battel, which he lost in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others, which remained unbroken, took the advantage of a strong piece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet avoiding thereby the present fury of the Souldiers, they obtained of the Vanquishers life and liberty to return into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded between him and the Athenians for the present, and for this clemency he was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greeks.

SECT. III.

The good success which Philip had in many enterprises.

Now had Philip leisure to look Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pannonians, his irreconcilable Enemies and borderers: both which he invaded with so prosperous success, as he slew Bardillius, King of the Illyrians, with seven thousand of his Nation, and thereby recovered all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedonia; and withal, upon the death of the King of Pannonia, he piec'd that Country, and after a main victory obtained, he enforced them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done, than (without staying to take longer breath) he halted speedily towards Larissa, upon the River Peneus in Thessaly, of which which Town he soon made himself Master; and thereby he got good footing into that Country, whereof he made use in time following. Now, although he resolved either to subdue the Thebans, or to make them his own against all others; because the horse-men of that Country were the best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it most for his safety to close up the entrances out of Thrace, lest while he invaded Thebally and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or over-run Macedon, as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous river of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and won it. He also recovered Pynda, and (to the North of Amphipolis) the City of Crenides (sometime Datus) and called it after his name Philippi: to the people whereof, Saint Paul afterwards directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in Mines of Gold, out of which, greatly to the advancement of Philip's affairs, he drew yearly a thousand Talents, which make six hundred thousand French Crowns.

And that he might with the more ease disburthen the Thracian shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had given a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entered into league with his Father's malicious enemies, the Olynthians, whom he the better to flatter unto him, he gave them the City of Pynda with the Territory, meaning nothing less, than that they should enjoy it, or their own Estate, many years.

Now that he might by degrees win ground upon the Greeks, he took the fair occasion to deliver the City of Phères in Thebally, from the Tyrants Lysiphras and Tisiphon: who, after they had conspired with Thebe's Wife of Alexander, who usurped upon the liberty of that State, they themselves (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Phères restored to her former liberty. Which act of Philip did for ever after fatten the Thebans unto him, and to his exceeding great advantage, bind them to his service.

SECT. IV.

Of the Phocian War, which first drew Philip into Greece.

About this time, to wit, in the second year of the hundred and sixth Olympiad eight years after the Battle of Mantineæ, and about the eighth year of Antisthenes Olynth, began that War, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions, concur towards the execution of eternal providence, and of every great alteration in the World, there is some preceding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this revenged hatred by the Thebans, Thebansians, and Loricans, conceived against the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with half a hand wield the sword out of their fingers; but the Greeks themselves, beating down their own defences, to give him an easy passage, and beating themselves to give him Victory without peril; left nothing unperformed towards their own slavery, saving the title and imposition. Of this War the Thebans (made over-proud by their Victory at Leuctra) were the inflamers. For at the Council of the Amphyziones, or of the general Estates of Greece, in which at that time they sway'd most, they caus'd both the Lacedæmonians and Phocians, to be condemn'd in greater sums of money than they could well bear; the one for supplanting the Castle of Calcedon in the time of peace, the other for ploughing up a piece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delfus. The Phocians being resolv'd not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on, and encouraged by the Lacedæmonians; and for refusal were exposted as Sacrilegious, and accus'd to all their neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawful to invade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philemelus, a Captain of their own, cast the same dice of hazard that Cæsar after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their own Nation. And the better to bear out an ungracious quarrel, of which there was left no hope of composition, they resolv'd to sack the Temple it self. For fearing that for the ploughing of a piece of Acropolis ground, they had so much offended their Neighbour-god, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worse could befall them than already was intended; they resolv'd to take the gold with the ground, and either to perish for all, or to prevail against all that had communion to call them to account. The treasure which they took out of the Temple in the beginning of the War, was ten thousand Talents, which in those days served them to wage a great many men; and such was their success in the beginning of the War, as they won three great battles against the Thebans, Thebansians, and Loricans; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philemelus cast himself head-long over the Rock of Arctus.

In the mean while the Cities of Cheroneia, both to defend themselves against their bad neighbour Philip, who encroached upon them, and to draw others into their quarrel, rendred themselves to the Athenians. Philip prepar'd to get them into his hands, and at the siege of Melone lost one of his eyes. It is said, That he that shot him, did purposely direct his Arrow toward him, and that it was written on the shaft thereof: After Philip; After to Philip; for so he was called that gave him the wound. This City he even'd with the foil.

The Tyrant Lysiphras before mentioned, while Philip was busied on the border of Thrace, and the Thebansians engaged in the holy War, enter'd Thebally with new Forces, being assisted by Onomarchus Commander of the Phœcian Army, in place of Philemelus. For hereby the Phocians, hop'd so to entertain the Thebansians at home, as they should not find leisure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the second time call'd into Thebally; but both the Thebansians and Macedonians (Philip being present) were utterly overthrown by Onomarchus, and great numbers of both Nations lost. From Thebally, Onomarchus drew speedily towards Bœotia, and with the same victorious Army brake the forces of the Bœotians, and took from them their City of Coronea. But Philip, impatient of his late misadventure, after he had re-enforc'd his Army, return'd with all speed into Thebally, there to find again the honour which he lately lost; and was the second time encountered by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twenty thousand foot, and five hundred horse. All this great preparation sufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune. His Army

Army overturned, six thousand slain, and three thousand taken: of which number himself being one, was among others hang'd by Philip. Those that fled, were in part received by the Athenian Gallies, which sail'd along the Coast, commanded by Cæres; but the greatest number of those that took the Sea, were therein devoured ere they recover'd them. Lysiphras was now again driven out of Thebally, and Phères made free as before.

SECT. V.

Of the Olynthian War. The ambitious practices of Philip.

From hence Philip resolv'd to invade Phœcia it self, but the Athenians did not favour his entrance into those parts, and therefore with the help of the Lacedæmonians, they retrench'd his passage at the Straits of Thermopylæ. Whereupon he return'd unto Macedon, and after the taking of Micyræ, Varone, and other Towns he quarrell'd with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had woo'd to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had ever more both braved and beaten the Macedonians. It is said, that Philip having put to death Archeolus his half Brother (for Amyntas had three sons by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other Sons by Gygæ; but Philip's elder Brother by the same Mother being dead, he determin'd to rid himself also of the rest) the two younger held themselves within Olynthus; and that the receiving of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the war, Juliane affirmeth. Just quarrels are sustain'd by just Princes, but to this King all things were lawful that might serve his turn: all his affections, and passions, how divers soever in other men, were in his ambition swallowed up, and thence converted. For he neither forbore the murder of his own Brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelity: he effected no place strong where his Arms loaden with gold might enter; nor any City or State unconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could lose the sense of other mens sorrow and subjection. And because he thought it vain to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had inclin'd all the power they had within their own walls, he enter'd their Territory, and by the advantage of a well compounded and trained Army, he gave them two overthrowes ere he sat down before the City it self: which done, he bought Eubœiæ and Lophocæ from their people, and from the service of their Country and Common-weal, by whose treason he enter'd the Town, slew his Brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the Inhabitants for slaves by the drum. By the spoil of this place, he greatly enrich'd himself, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withal, which he daily did. For so was he advis'd by the Oracle in the beginning of his undertaking, That he should make his assaults with silver spears: Whereupon Horace well and truly said,

En. Cæm.
94. 16.

— Diffidit Urbium
Portas vir Macedo, & subruit æmulis Reges munibus.

By gifts the Macedon claus'd Gates against,
And Kings enjoying his estate brought under.

And it is true, that he won more by corruption and fraud than he did by force. For as he had in all the principal Cities of Greece his secret work-ers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spain): So when in the contention between the Competitors for the Kingdom of Thrace, he was chosen Arbitrator, he came not to the Council accompanied with Piety and Justice, but with a powerful Army, and having beaten and slain both Kings, gave sentence for himself, and made the Kingdom his own.

SECT. VI.

How Philip ended the Phocian War.

The War still continued between the Phocians and the Associates of the holy War: the Bœotians, finding themselves unable to subdue without some present aid, sent unto Philip for succour, who willingly yielded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men, as were neither sufficient to smother their enemies; nor to assure themselves; but yet to enable them to continue the War; and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Antisthenes Olynth for supply of treasure, who lent them thirty Talents, which makes a hundred and fourscore thousand French Crowns: but when with these supplies they had fill the worst against the Phocians, who held from them three of the strongest Cities within Bœotia it self, they then besought Philip of Macedon that he would assist them in person, to whom they would give an entrance into their Territory, and in all things obey his Commandments in War.

Now had Philip what he long'd for, for he knew himself in state to give the law to both, and to quelling all his other purposes towards the North, he march'd with a speedy pace towards Bœotia, where being arriv'd, Phalacrus who commanded the Phœcian Army, fearing to shock with this victorious King, made his own peace, and withdrew himself with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leaving the Phœcians to the mercy of the Conquerors, and for conclusion, he had the glory of that War called Sacred, which the Greeks in many mutual slaughters had continued for ten years; and besides the glory, he possist himself of Orehoeme, Coronea, and Cosia, in the Country of the Bœotians, who invited him to be victorious over themselves. He brought the Phœcians into servitude, and wasted their Cities, and gave them but their Villages to inhabit, reserving unto himself the yearly tribute of threescore Talents, which make six and thirty thousand French Crowns. He also hereby (besides the frame of pity for service of the gods) obtained the same double voice in the Council of the Amphyziones which the Phocians had, with the superintendency of the Pyrian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phœcian sacrilege.

SECT.

SECT. VII.

How Philip with ill success attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

PHILIP, after his triumphant return into Macedonia, by the Lieutenant of his Army Parnonius, slaughtered many thousand of Thracians and Dardanians, and brought the Thracians to pay him, the tenth part of all their Revenues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians stayed his fury. Perinthus was a City of Thrace, seated upon Pontus, in the mid-way between Sestos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a people resolved to defend their liberty against Philip, where the Athenians encouraged and assisted them. Philip came down before it with a puissant Army, made many fair breaches, gave many furious assaults, built many overtopping and commanding towers about it. But he was repelled with equal violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continual assaults to weary them, and wait both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Perinthians with men and money, and succoured from Byzantium, which stood upon the same Sea-coast, but they were relieved from Athens, Chios, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoever was wanting to their necessity. But because Philip of Byzantium by reason of their neighbourhood, and easy passage by water, gave them often and ready help, Philip removed the one half of his Army, and besetted it, leaving fifteen thousand foot before Perinthus to force it in that thought: But to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly do that undertake difficult enterprises at one time) and returned into Macedon with no less dishonour than loss: whereupon he made an overture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired it: to which though Phocion prevailed them all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly advantage their conditions, yet Demosthenes with his eloquence prevailed in the refusal. In the mean while, Philip having digested his late affront, and supplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred new vessels, and ten Merchantships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his son Alexander, led them into Scythia: but he was also unsuccessful in that enterprise: for the Tribals, a people of Messia, set on him in his return, wounded him, and took from him the greatest part of the spoils which he had gathered.

SECT. VIII.

How Philip overthrowing the Greeks in the battle of Cheronea, was chosen Captain General of Greece. The death of Philip.

AMONG these Northern Nations (part of which he suppress, and part quitted) he spent some eighty years; and in the ninth year after the end of the Holy War, he was, by his great advantage, invited again by the Greeks to their alliance. For the Citizens of Ampyloides, having disobeyed the decree of Ampyloides, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Lo-

crans gave countenance and aid to the Ampyloians, the rest were not of themselves able to constrain them, they besought Philip to come in person to their alliance. Now you must think, that Philip was not long in resolving upon this enterprise; he needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keep back, nor other dissuasion then a flattering power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Army forthwith to march; the same being compounded of thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entered Phocis, won Platea, and brought into subjection all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to fear that a great part of this storm would fall on themselves, yet were they dissuaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choice (having drawn the Thebans to join with them) to leave the enjoying of their estates, and their freedom to the chance of one battle, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Orator's eloquence could not prevail. It is true, that he could far more easily mind them of the virtue of their Ancestors, than make them such as they were. He might repeat unto them (with words moving passion, the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transform the Macedonians into Perinthians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, or Aristides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great virtues they had payed with the greatest ingratitude that ever Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrary faction he was at this time in disgrace, and not employed; in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the confederates encountered, although some thousands of the Athenians did abide the killing, and the like number well near of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of the worthy men on that side to hold up the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choice Captains of the Macedonians, encouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gave to Philip to thinning a victory; that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despite of the Nations interjection) into Persia, India, and Egypt, so it cut to the ground, and gave end and date to all the Grecian glory; Yea their liberty (saith Currius) with their large Dominion, won with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for ever lost.

Now this advised King (never passionate to his disadvantage) to the end he might obtain the Sovereignty over all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captain-General against the Persians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let go those Athenians that were taken at this battle of Cheronea, as he also forbore to attempt any thing against their City: but in Thrace (which lately by the virtue of Epanimondas triumphed over the rest) he lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soon after (according to the long desire which he had nourished of this Sovereignty) by the general States at Corinth, filled the first Commander of all the Greeks, and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Army of great strength, and under the Commandment of Attalus and Parnonius, transported the same over the Hellespont into Asia, to begin the War. Of his enterprise against Persia, he

he fought success from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he received such another convertible riddle, as Crasus did, when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like sort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discern and withhold the flatteries of our own appetites, so did Philip's ambitious desire to invade Persia abate his judgement, so far, that the death wherewith himself was threatened, he understood to be delivered of his enemy, whom he intended presently to invade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, he prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus; to which feast and pastimes thereof appointed, he invited all his Friends and Allies, with the principal persons of the Grecian Cities, from whom he received much honour and many rich Presents: but this was indeed the Feast of his Funeral. For, having refused to do Justice to one Pausanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly favoured by Philip) had first made drunk, and then left to be carnally abused by divers base persons; this Pausanias grew into so great a detestation of the King's partiality in so foul a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater; he drew a sword from under his long garment and wounded him to death, when he had lived six and forty years, and reigned five and twenty. Julius reports it, that Olympias encouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband; which after his death he boldly avowed, by the honour he did unto Pausanias, in crowning his dead body, in consecrating his sword unto Apollo, by building for him a Monument, and other like Graces.

SECT. XI.

What good foundations of Alexander's greatness were laid by Philip. Of his laudable qualities and issue.

NOW although he were then taken from the World, when he had mastered all opposition on that side of the Sea; and had seen the fruits of his hopes, and labours changing colour towards ripeness and perfection; yet he was herein happy, that he lived to see his Son Alexander at Man's estate, and had himself been an eye-witness of his resolution and singular valour in this last battle.

The foundation of whose future greatness he laid last so fondly for him, with so plain a pattern of the Buildings which himself meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was far more easy to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings unto Philip, though less famous. For, besides the recovery of Macedon itself in competition between him and the Sons of Epirus, the one allied by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians; and besides the regaining of many places possessed by the Thyrians, the overthrow of those Northern Kings his Neighbours, the overthrow of Olympus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritime Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedom; and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it self against the greatest Kings of the World, and won upon them; He left unto his Son, and had bred up for him, so many choice Commanders; as the most of them, both both for their valour and judgement in the War, were no less worthy of Crowns, than himself was that wore a Crown: For it was said of Parnonius (whom Alexander, ungrateful to so great virtue, impiously murdered) That Parnonius had performed many things challenging eternal fame, without the King; but the King without Parnonius never did any thing worthy of remembrance: as for the rest of his Captains, though content to obey the Son of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexander's death endure to acknowledge any man Superior to themselves.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more virtues, than Nature and his excellent education had enriched him with virtues. For, besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, he had this favour of piety, that he rather laboured to satisfy those that were grieved, than to suppress them. Whereof (among many other) we find a good example in his dealing with Arcadian and Nicean. Whom when for their evil speech of Philip, his familiars persuaded him to put to death, he answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gave him ill language, or in himself: Secondly, that it was in every man's own power to be well spoken of; and this was shortly after proved; for after Philip relieved their necessities, there were none within his Kingdom that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon he told those that had persuaded him to use violence, that he was a better physician for evil speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his Son are remembered by Cicero and Gellius; and by Dion and Cassiodorus exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyenus and Erostratus; his wife sayings, by Plutarch. And albeit he held Macedon as in his own right, all the time of his reign, yet was he not the true and next heir thereof: for Amintas the Son of his Brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the protection during his Infancy) had the right. This Amintas he married to his daughter Cyna, who had by him a daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philip's base Son Arideus, her Uncle by the Mothers side: both which Olympias, Philip's first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Arideus by extreme torments, Eurydice he strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Uncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her Brother Alexander's death slain at Sardis, by the commandment of Antigonus.

By Audita an Illyrian, his second Wife, he had Cyna, married as is shewed before.

By Niceipolis, the Sister of Jafus, a Tyrant of Boeotia, he had Thessalonica, whom Cassander, after he had taken Pidna, married; but she was afterward by her Father-in-Law Antipater put to death.

By Cleopatra the Niece of Attalus, he had Carusus, whom others call Philip: him Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be roasted to death in a Copper Pan. Others lay his murder to Alexander himself. By the same Cleopatra he had likewise a daughter called Europa, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers breast.

By Phila and Meda he had no issue.

He had also two Concubines, Asinoe, whom after he had gotten with child, he married to an eunuque n an, called Lagus, who bare Pholony King of Ægypt, called the Son of Lagus, but esteemed the Son of Philip: by Philmna his second Concubine, a publick Dancer, he had Ardeus, of whom we shall have much occasion to speak hereafter.

CHAP. II.

Of Alexander the Great.

SECT. I.

A brief rehearsal of Alexander's doings, before he invaded Asia.

Alexander, afterwards called the Great, succeeded unto Philip his Father's being a Prince no less valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and enriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his Reign over the Macedonians four hundred and seventeen years, after Rome was built, and after his own Birth twenty years. The strange dreams of Philip his Father, and that one of the gods in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, (omit as foolish Tales; but, that the Temple of Diana (a work the most magnificent of the World) was burnt upon the day of his Birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the news of three several Victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and tore shewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Upon the change of the King, the Neighbour Nations, whom Philip had oppressed, began to consult about the recovery of their former liberty, and to adventure it by force of Arms. Alexander's young years gave them hope of prevailing, and his suspected severity increased courage in those, who could better resolve to die, than to live slavishly. But Alexander gave no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily have endangered the health of his Estate. For after revenge taken upon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew upon his Tomb, and the celebration of his Funerals, he first fastned unto him his own Nation, by freeing them from all exactions and bodily slavery, other than their service in his Wars; and used such Kingly austerity towards those that contemned his young years, and such clemency to the rest that perwaded themselves of the cruelty of his disposition, as all affections being pacified at home, he made a present journey into Peloponnesus, and so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Council of the States of Greece, he was, according to the great desire of his heart, elected Captain General against the Persians, upon which War Philip had not only resolved, (who had obtained the same Title of General Commander) but had transported under the leading of Parmenio and Attalus, a part of his Army, to recover some places on Asia side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprise against the Persian occupied all Alexander's affections: those fair marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion he now shot at both sleeping and waking; all other thoughts and imaginations were either grievous or hateful. But a contrary wind ariseth: for he receiveth advertisement, that the Athenians, Thebans and Lacedæmonians, had united themselves against him, and by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recovery of their former freedom. Hereto they were perwaded by Demetrius, himself being thereto perwaded by the gold of Peria: the device he used was more subtle than probable; for he caused it to be bruited, that Alexander was slain in a battle against the Triballes, and brought into the assembly a companion, whom he had corrupted, to affirm that himself was present and wounded in the battle. There is indeed a certain Doctrine of policy (as policy is now a days defined by falsehood and knavery) that devised rumours and lies, if they serve true turn but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true. Common people are sometimes mockt by them as Souldiers are by false Alarms in the wars; but in all that I have observed, I have found the success as ridiculous as the invention. For as those that find themselves at one time abused by such like bruits, do at other times neglect their duties, when they are upon true reports, and in occasions perilous summoned to assemble, so do all men in general condemn the Ventures of such trumpany, and for them, fear upon necessary occasion to entertain the truth it self. This labour unlooked for, and loss of time, was not only very grievous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Grecians, of whose assistance he thought himself assured, his present undertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot endure to strive against the wind, shall hardly attain the Port, which he purpooth to recover; and if no less becometh the worstest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewail them.

He therefore made such expedition towards those Revolters, as that himself, with the Army that followed him, brought them the first news of his preparation. Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moved, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Ambassadors to pacify the King, and to be received again into his grace. Alexander was not long in resolving; for the Persians perwaded him to pardon the Grecians. While men are not easily drawn from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King ever brought to effect any great affair, who hath entangled himself in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same certain end.

And having now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolved to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Triballes, Peucet, Getes, Agreans, and other salvage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not only other of his Predecessors, but even Philip his Father: with all which, after divers Overthrows given them, he made peace, or else brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good success, he could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more natural to man than liberty: the Greeks had enjoyed it over-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once again. The Thebans who had in their Citadel a Garrison of three thousand Macedonians, attempt to force it. Alexander hatheth to their succour, and presents himself with thirty thousand foot, all old Souldiers, and three thousand Horse, before the City, and gave the Inhabitants some days to resolve, being even heart-sick with the desire of passing into Asia. So unwilling, indeed, he was to draw blood of the Grecians, by whom he hoped to serve himself elsewhere, that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliver into his hands Phenix and Prothytes, the stirrers up of the Rebellion. But they opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking in of the Ocean Sea) instead of such an Answer, as men besieged and abandoned should have made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be delivered unto them; as if Thebes alone, then lay in the balance of Fortune with the Kingdom of Macedon, and many other Provinces, could either have evened the scale or swayed it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obduracy. For while the Thebans oppose the assailant, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their City taken and rased to the ground, six thousand slain, and thirty thousand sold for slaves, at the price of four hundred and forty Talents. This the King did to the terror of the other Grecian Cities.

Many arguments were used by Cleander one of the Prisoners, to perwade Alexander to forbear the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to believe that they were rather misled, by giving half credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perwaded of Alexander's death, they rebelled but against his successor. He also besought the King to remember, that his Father Philip had his education in that City, yea, that his Ancestor Hercules was born therein: but all perwasions were fruitless; the times wherein offences are committed do greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at liberty Timocles the Sifter of Thebans, who died in defence of the liberty of Greece against his Father Philip. This noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him ravished, he threatened to take her life, unless she would confess her treasure: she led that Thracian to a Well, and told him, that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian stooped to look into the Well, she suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had received into their City so many of the Thebans, as had escaped and fled unto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but upon condition to deliver into his hands both their Orators which perwaded this second revolt, and their Captains; yet in the end, it being a torment unto him to retard the enterprise of Peria, he was content that the Orators should remain, and accepted of the banishment of the Captains, wherein he was exceeding ill advised, had not his fortune, or rather the providence of God, made all the resistance against him unprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Grecians betook themselves to the service of the Persian, whom after a few days he invaded.

SECT. II.

How Alexander passed into Asia, fought with the Persians upon the River of Granicus.

When all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring did pass the Hellefont, and being ready to dit embark, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers, not to make any waste in their own Territory, or to burn, or deface those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possess. He landed his Army, consisting of two and thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, all old Souldiers, near unto Troy, where he offered a solemn sacrifice upon Aciliss's Tomb, his maternal Ancestor.

But before he left his own coast, he put to death without any offence given him, all his Mother-in-laws Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not sparing such of his own as he suspected. He also took with him many of his tributary Princes, of whose fidelity he doubted; thinking by unjust cruelty to assure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended unto him, though agreeing very well with the Justice of God; for all that he had planned, was soon after withered and rooted up; those whom he most trusted were the most traitorous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another merciless sword as his own, and all manner of confusion followed his dead body to the grave, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexander's landing on Asia side was brought to Darius, he so much scorned the Army of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himself, as having stiled him his servant in a letter which he wrote unto him, reprehending his disloyalty and audacity (for Darius intituled himself King of Kings, and the Kinsman of the gods) he gave order withal to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander alive, whip him with rods, and then convey him to his presence: that they should sink his Ships, and send the Macedonians taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea; belike into Æthiopia, or some other unhealthy part of Africa.

In this fort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartless multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians: But the ill fortunes of men bearing thim to the ground, by what strong confidence for-armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heap into the field, gave rather an exceeding advantage to his enemies, than any discouragement at all. For, besides that they were men utterly unacquainted with dangers; men, who by name, and countenance of their King were wont to prevail against those of less courage than themselves; men that took more care how to embroider with gold and silver their upper garments, as if they attended the invasion but of the Sun-beams, than they did to arm themselves with Iron and Steel against the sharp pikes, swords and darts of the hardy Macedonians. I say, besides all these, even the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which every one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turn to fight, filled every one of them with the care of their own safety, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their own breath, and that of their Horses, in running away. The Macedonians, as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselves with the Gold and Jewels of Persia, both which they needed; so the Persians, who expected nothing in that War but blows and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to constrain them in assembling themselves for his service; but their own fears and cowardice, which in time of danger had more power over them, they only then obeyed, when their rebellion against so servile a passion did justly and violently require it. For, saith Vegetius, Quem admodum bene exer-citatus miles prælum cupit, ita formidat indolens; nam sciendum est in pugna usum aniplius prodesse quam vires. As the well practised Soldier desires to come to battle, so the raw one fears it: for we must understand, that in fight it more avails to have been accustomed unto the like, than only to have rude strength. What manner of men the Persians were, Alexander discovered in the first encounter; before which time it is said, by those that write his story, that it was hard to judge, whether his daring to undertake the Conquest of an Empire so well peopled with an handful of men, or the success he had, were more to be wondered at. For at the River of Granick, which severeth the Territory of Troy from Propontis, the Persians sought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and bank of the River to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to climb up into, and scale from the Level of the water. Great resistance (saith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander prevailed. But it seems to me that the Victory then gotten was exceeding easy, and that the twenty thousand Persian footmen, dead to be slain, were rather killed in the back, in running away, than hurt in the beloms by resisting. For had those twenty thousand foot, and two hundred and fifty horsemen, or, after Plutarch, two thousand and five hundred horse-men, dyed with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not have bought their lives at so small a rate, as with the loss of four and thirty of all sorts of his own. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountered two of the Persian Commanders, Spirabrides and Rafaces; and that the Persian horse-men fought with great fury, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Grecians in Darius's pay, holding themselves in one body upon a piece of ground of advantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last, how then doth it resemble truth, that such resistance having been made, yet of Alexander's Army there fell but twelve footmen, and two and twenty horsemen.

SECT. III.

A digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the Battle of Granick.

THE winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terror upon all those of the lesser Asia, as he obtained all the Kingdoms thereof without a blow, some one or two Towns excepted. For in all invasions, where the Nations invaded have once been beaten upon a great advantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Straits, and Mountains, they will soon have persuaded themselves, that such an enemy upon equal terms and even ground, can hardly be resisted. It was therefore Machiav-el's counsel, That he which resolveth to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debared all entrance, by the natural difficulties of the ways. One passage or other is commonly left unguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Country be distracted; and yet lightly some one place will be found that is defended very weakly. How often have the Alps given way to Armies, breaking into Italy? Yea, Where shall we find that ever they kept out an Invader? Yet are they such as (to speak briefly) assist with all difficulties those that travel over them;
 but they give no security to those that lye behind them: for they are of too large extent.
 The Towns of Lombardy persuaded themselves that they might enjoy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Swissers had undertaken to hinder Francis the French King, from descending into the Dutchy of Milan: but whilst these Patrons of Milan, whom their own dwelling in those Mountains had made fittest of all other for such a Francis, appeared in Lombardy, so much the greater terror of the Inhabitants, by how much the less they had expected his arrival. What shall we say of those Mountains, which lock up whole Regions in such fort, as they leave but one Gate open: The Straits, or (as they were called) the Gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Ther-mopyla, have seldom been attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how seldom (if ever) have they been attempted in vain? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Ther-mopyla; Cyrus the younger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how strongly forever they had been locked and barred, yet were those Countries open enough to a Fleet that should enter on the backside. The defence of Rivers, how hard a thing it it is, we find examples in all histories that bear good witness. The deepest have many Floods;

 the swiftest and broadest may be passed by Boats, in case it be found a matter of difficulty to make a Bridge. He that hath men enough to defend all the length of his own bank, hath also enough to beat his enemy; and may therefore do better to let him come over, to his loss, than by striving in vain to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his own disadvantage, all the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, having their means of safeguard taken from them by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainly, if a River were sufficient defence against an Army, the Isle of Mona, now called Anguilly, which is divided from North Wales, by an Arm of the Sea, had been safe enough against the Romans, invading it under the conduct of Julius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to spend the time in making Vessels to transport his forces, did assay the floods. Whereby he so amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like provisions by Sea, that surely believing nothing could be hard or invincible to men, which came to minded to war, they humbly in-treated for peace, and yielded the Island. Yet the Britains were men stout enough, the Persians were very dauntless.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to pass the River of Granick in face of the enemy, not marching higher to seek an easier way, nor attempting to convey his men, over by some safer means. For, having beaten them upon their own ground, he did thereby cut off no less of their reputation, than of their strength, leaving no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such unable Protectors.

Soon after this Victory he recovered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trallians, and Magnesia, which were rendered unto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Country, he received with great grace, suffering them to be governed by their own Laws. For he observed it well; Novum Imperium inchoantibus, nullis clonstie fama; It is commodious unto such as lay the foundations of a new Sovereignty, to have the same of being merciful. He then by Parmenio wan Miletus, and by force mastered Halicarnassus, which because it resisted obstinately, he raled to the ground. From whence he entered into Caria, where Ada the Queen, who had been cast out of all that she held (except the City of Alinda by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her self unto him, and adopted him her Son and Successor; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdom to her disposing. He then entered into Lycia, and Pamphylia and obtained all the Sea-coasts, and subjecting unto him Pisidia, he directed himself towards Darius (who was said to be advanced towards him with a marvellous Army) by the way of Phrygia: For, all the Province of Asia the less, bordering upon the Sea, his first Victory laid under his feet.

While he gave order for the government and settling of Lycia, and Pamphylia, they sent Clean-der to raise five new Captains in Peloponessus, for marching towards the North, he entered Celene, seated on the River Idanor, which was abandoned unto him; the Castle only holding out, which held out forty days was given up: for so long time he gave them to attend succour from Darius.
 From Celene he pass'd through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a City called Ger- dium, the Regal Seat, in former times of King Midus.

 In this City it was, that he found the Gordian Knot, which when he knew not how to undo, he cut it asunder with his Sword. For there was an ancient Prophecy did promise to him that could untie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner now, so it were done, assumed to himself the fulfilling of the Prophecy,
 by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the less towards the east, he took care to clear the Sea-coast on his back, and to thrust the Persians out of the Islands of Lesbos, Chio, and Cos: the charge whereof he committed unto two of his Captains, giving them such order as he thought to be most convenient for that service; and delivering unto them fifty Talents to defray the charges, and withal out of his first spoil gotten, he sent threecore Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon. From Celene he removed to Anicra, now called Anguri, standing on the faire River of Sangar, which runneth through Cardus: where he mu-ltered his Army, and then entered Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themselves unto him, and obtained freedom of tribute: where he left Catus Governour with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Here he understood of the death of Memnon, Darrius's Lieutenant, which heartned him greatly to pass on towards him: for of this only Captain he had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For so much hath the Spirit of some one man excelled; as it hath undertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Commonweals, the erection of Monarchies, the Conquest of Kingdoms and Empires, guided handfulls of men against multitudes of equal bodily strength, contrivied victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, converted the fearful passions of his own followers into magnanimity, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize: such spirits have been stirred up in sundry Ages of the world, and in divers parts thereof, to erect and cast down again, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things. Persons and States, to the same certain ends, which the infinite Spirit of the Universal, piercing, moving and governing all things, hath ordained. Certainly, the things that this King did, were marvellous, and would hardly have been undertaken by any man else; and though his Father had determined to have invaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would have contented himself with some part thereof, and not have discovered the River of Indus as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherewith he ran over so large a portion of the World in so short a space, may justly be imputed unto this, that he was never encountered by an equal spirit, concurring with equal power against him. Hereby it came to pass that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, than desert places, and the meer length of tedious journeys could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praiseworthy, as for the huge bulk. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discover as brave a spirit as Alexander's, and working no less exactly, though the effects were less material, as were also the forces and power of command, and by which it wrought. But he that would find the exact pattern of a noble Commander, must look upon such as Epaminondas, that encountering worthy Captains, and those better followed than themselves, have by their singugular virtue over topped their valiant enemies, and still prevailed over those, that would not have yielded one foot to any other. Such as these are do feldom live to obtain great Empires. For it is a work of more labour and longer time, to master the equal forces of one hardy and well-ordered State, than to tread down and utterly subdue a multitude of feeble Nations, compounding the body of a grofs and unwieldy Empire. Wherefore these Parvo-Potentes, men that with little have done much upon enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choice examples of worth; but great Conquerors, to be rather admired for the substance of their actions, than the exquisite managing: exactness and greatness concurring to feldom, that I can find no instance of both in one, save only that brave Roman, Cæsar.

Having thus far digressed, it is time that we return into our Eastern Conquerors; who is travelling hastily towards Gilicia, with a desire to recover the Straits thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch unto Greece, he sent to those Cities, in which he repared most truit, some of the Persian Targets which he had recovered in this first battle, upon which by certain inscriptions, he made them partakers of his Victory. Herein he well advised himself; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gains in the Wars, as he doth of the spoils, shall never be long followed of those of the better fort. For men which are either well-born, or well-bred, and have more of wealth than of reputation, do as often fristise themselves with the purchase of glory, as the weak in fortune, and frong in courage, do with the gain of gold and silver.

The Governour of Gilicia hearing of Alexander's coming on, left some Companies to keep the Straits, which were indeed very defensible, and withal, as Curtius noteth, he began over-late to prise and put in execution the counsel of Memon: who in the beginning of the Wars advised him to wait all the provisions for Men and Horse, that could not be lodged in strong places, and always to give ground to the Invader, till he found some such notable advantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of Victory. For the fury of an invading Army is best broken, by delays, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes repoting themselves in beds, and others on the cold ground. These and the like sudden alterations bring many Difficulties upon all Nations out of their own Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleep, and refusing to give or take battle, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, he might perchance have saved his own life, and his estate. For it was one of the greatest encouragements given by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and last fatal battle, That they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Nexer, when he invaded Greece and fought abroad, being beaten, lost only his men; but Darius being invaded by the Greeks, and fighting at home by being beaten, lost his Kingdom. Perticles though the Lacedæmonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawn to hazard a battle: for the invaded ought evermore to fight upon the advantage of time and place. Because we read Histories to inform our understanding by the examples therein found, we will give some instances of those that have perished by adventuring in their own Countries, to charge an invading Army. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brink of their destruction.

Pompey was well advised for a while, when he gave Cæsar ground; but when by the importunity of his Captains he adventured to fight at Pharsalia, he lost the battle, lost the freedom of Rome, and his own life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battle with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of found Judgment, that those Councils which promise victory in all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France, made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the fifth, when he invaded Provence; by waisting the Country, and forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alva weary the French in Naples, and dissolve the boltrous Army of the Prince of Orange in the Low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrary to the advice of their General, would needs fight a battle with the Burgundians, invading their Country, and could not be persuaded to linger the time, and stay their advantages; but they lost eight and twenty thousand upon the place. Philip of Valois set upon King Edward at Crèffy, and King John (when the English were well near tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit have been waited to nothing) constrained the black Prince with great fury, near Poitiers, to joyn battle with him: But all men know what lamentable success these two French Kings found. Charles the fifth of France, made another kind of Fabian-Warfare; and though the English burnt and wasted many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbear blows, and followed his advice, which told him, That the English could never get his inheritance by smok. And it is reported by Béloy and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that he was from him the Dutchy of Guyen without ever putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wile men grow short lived, and the charge of things is committed unto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any found advice. The course which Memon had propounded, must in all appearance of reason, have brought the Macedonians to a great perplexity, and made him stand still a while at the Straits of Gilicia, doubting whether it were more shameful to return, or dangerous to proceed. For, had Cappadocia, and Paphlagonia been waited while Alexander was far off; and the Straits of Gilicia been defended by Asines, Governour of that Province, with the best of his forces, hunger would not have suffered the enemy, to stay the trial of all means that might be thought upon, of forcing that passage; or if the place could not have been maintained, yet might Gilicia, at better leisure have been so thoroughly spoiled, that the heart of his Army should have been broken, by seeking out miseries by painful travel.

But Asines leaving a small number to defend the Straits, took the best of his Army with him, to waste and spoil the Country; or rather, as may seem, to find himself some work, by pretence of which he might honestly run further away from Alexander. He should rather have adventured his person in custody of the Straits, whereby he might perhaps have saved the Province; and in the mean time, all that was in the fields, would have been con-conveyed into strong Towns. So should his Army, if it were driven from the place of advantage, have found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himself with his horsemen have had the less work in destroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gave the Gilicians cause to wish for Alexander's coming; and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wile in apprehending all forms of danger. These Guardians of the Straits, hearing that Asines made all haste to joyn himself with Darius, burning down all as he went, like one despairing of the defence began to grow circumspect, and to think that surely their General, who gave as lost the Country behind their backs, had exposed themselves unto certain death, as men that were good for nothing else but to dull the Macedonian Swords. Wherefore not affecting to dye for their Prince and Country (which honour they saw that Asines himself could well forbeare) they speedily followed the footsteps of their General, gleaming after his Harvest. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Gilicia, abandoned by the cowardice of his enemies, and the whole Province that had been alienated from the Persian side by their indiscretion.

SECT. IV.

Of the unmarlike Army levied by Darius against Alexander. The unadvised courses which Darius took in this expedition. He is vanquished at Issus; where his Brother, Wife and Children are made Prisoners: of some things following the battle of Issus.

IN the mean season Darius approached, who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Army of more than two hundred and ninety thousand Soldiers, out of divers Nations; Justin multiplies them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse; Plutarch, at six hundred thousand.

The manner of his coming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a Masker than a man of War, and like one that took more care to set out his glory and riches, than to provide for his own safety, perfwading himself, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pomp and sumptuous Pageants. For, before the Army there was carried the holy Fire, which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests; and after them three hundred and three score and five young men, answering the number of the days of the year, covered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Jupiter drawn with white Horses, with their Riders clothed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; and after it, the Horse of the Sun: Next after these follow ten sumptuous Chariots, lined and garnished with silver and gold; and then the Vanguard of their horse, compounded of twelve several Nations, which the better to avoid confusion, did hardly understand each others language; and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serve very fitly to disorder all that followed them: in the tail of these horses the Regiment of Foot marched, which the Persians called Immortal, because if any died, the number was perfectly supplied: and these were armed with chains of gold, and their coats with the same metal embroidered, whereof the sleeves were garnished with pearl; baits, either to catch the hungry Macedonians withal, or to perfwade them that it were great incivility to cut, and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well said, Sampson exornatus miles, sed virtute superiorem aliis non exornavit, cum in palatium sportaret fortitudinis animi, & non vestimentis mirari, quoniam hostes velutium non debellavit; Let no man think that he exceedeth shof in valour, whom he exceedeth in gay garments; for it is by men armed with fortitude of mind, and not by the apparel they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrus that this advice was borrowed, who when he fought against the Samnites in that fatal battle, wherein they all swore either to prevail or dye, thirty thousand of them having apparelled themselves in white garments, with high crests, and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Soldiers to lay aside all fears: Non enim cresta vulnere facere, & per pila atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound no body, and the Roman pile would bore holes in painted and gilded shields.

To second this Court-like company, fifteen thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (be-like to breed the more terror) and these were honoured with the title of the King's Kinsmen. Then came Darius himself, the Gentlemen of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the Gods of his Nation, call and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not serve, to which they served their turns of these, by changing their maille-boodies in linen, portable, and current coin. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, covered with an open winged Eagle of the same metal: The hinder part whereon Darius fate, had a covering of ineffimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with silver, and their heads gilt; which they meant not to imbrue in the Macedonian blood, for fear of marring their beauty. He had for the proper guard of his own person, two hundred of the blood Royal; blood, too Royal and pretious to be spilled by any valorous adventure (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdy fellows, like the Switzers would have done him more service) and these were backt with thirty thousand foot-men, after whom again were led four hundred spare horses for the King, which if he had meant to have used, he would have marshalled somewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Rear-ward, the same being led by Sisygambis the King's Mother, and by his Wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great train of Ladies their attendants on horseback, with fifteen Wagons of the King's Children, and the Wives of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fifty Concubines, and a world of Nurses and Eunuchs, most sumptuously apparelled. By which it should seem that Darius thought that the Macedonians had been Comedians or Tumblers; for this Troop was far fitter to behold those sports than to be present at battles. Between these and a company of light-armoured slaves, with a world of Varlets, was the King's treasure, charged on six hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels brought as it proved, to pay the Macedonians. In this sort came the May-game-King into the field, incumbered with with a most unnecessary train of Strumpets, attended with troops of divers Nations, speaking divers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled; and for the most part so effeminate, and so rich in gold and in garments, as the fame could not but have encouraged the nakedst Nation of the World against them. We find it in daily experience, that all discourse of Magnanimity, of National Virtue, of Religion, of Liberty, and whatsoever else hath been wont to move and encourage Virtuous men, hath no force at all with the common Souldier, in comparison of spoil and riches. The rich ships are boarded upon all disadvantage, the rich Towns are furiously assaulted, and the plentiful Countries willingly invaded. Our English Nation have attempted many places in the Indies, and run upon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royals of Plate, and Pilotoes; which, had they been put to it upon the like disadvantages in Ireland, or in any poor Country, they would have turned their Pieces and Pikes against their Commanders, contending that they had been brought without reason to the butchery and slaughter. It is true that the War is made willingly, and for the most part with good success, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needy are always adventurous, so plenty is wont to thrust peril, and men that have well to live, do rather study how to live well, I mean wealthily, than care to dye (as they call it) honourably. Certe si n' arien a gagner que des coeups, volontiers il n'y va pas. No man makes halt to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blows.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his South-fayers, he would have satisfied himself by the out-sides of the Persians, and never have looked into the intrails of Beasts for success. For leaving the description of this second battle (which is indeed no where well described; neither, for the confusion and hasty running away of the Asiatics, could it be) we have enough by the slaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to inform us what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that threecore thousand Persian footmen were slain in this battle, with ten thousand of their horsemen; Or (as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horsemen, and besides this slaughter, 40000 taken prisoners, while of Alexander's Army there miscarried but two hundred and fourscore of all sorts, of which numbers Arius and other Histrions cut off almost the one half; it do verily believe, that this small number rather died with the over-travel and pains-taking in killing, their enemies, than by any strokes received from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate and the basest of the World) had any favour remaining of the ancient valour of their forefathers, they would never have fold to good cheap, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the King's children; had their own honour been valued by them at nothing, and the King's safety and his estate at less. Darius by this time found it true, that Choridamus a banished Grecian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which he had assembled of divers Nations, richly attired, but poorly armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the country, whom in passing by they would devour, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to assail; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, embattled in gross squadrons, which they call their Phalanx, well covered with Armour for defence, and furnished with weapons for offence of great advantage, would make for little account of his delicate Persians, loving their ease and their palat, being withal ill armed, and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertain (having for great abundance of treasure to do it withal) a sufficient number of the same Grecians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equal courage, he would repent him overlate, as taught by the miserable success like to follow.

But this discourse was so unpleasing to Darius (who had been accustomed to nothing so much as to his own praises, and to nothing so little as to hear truth) as he commanded that this poor Grecian should be presently slain: who while he was a funding in the Tormentor's hands, used this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom he had given this good counsel, should assuredly revenge his death, and lay deserved punishment upon Darius for despising his advice.

It was the saying of a Wife man: Desperata est Principis salus est, cujus aures ita formate sunt, ut optera que utilis, nec quicquam nisi juvandum accipiat; That Prince's safety is in a desperate case, whose ears judge all that is profitable to be too sharp, and will entertain nothing that is unpleasing.

For, liberty in Council is the life and essence of Council; Libertas consilii est que vita et essentia, quæ crepta consilium evanescit.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the advice given him by the Grecian Souldiers that served him, who intreated him not to fight in the Straits: But had they been Counsellors and Directors in that War, as they were underlings and commanded by others, they had with the help of a good troop of horsemen been able to have opposed the fury of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was overthrown with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Grecians, under their Captain Amyntas, held firm, and marched away in order, in despite of the Vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: we read in Histories ancient and modern, what brave retreats have been made by them, though the rest of the Army in which they have served, hath been broken.

At the battle of Ravenna, where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off unbroke and undismayed; whom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemours, and Nephew to Lenis the twelfth, charged, he was overthrown and slain in the place. For it is truly said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers fear them not, by being acquainted with dangers, periculo imminenti mali, opus ipsum, quantumvis difficile, aggrediuntur; They go about the business, if itself, how hard sever it be, not standing to consider of the danger, which the mischief hanging over their heads may bring; and as truly of those that know the Wars but by hear-say; Quod valentes sunt et prevalent ante pericula, in ipso tamen periculo discidunt; They have ability enough, and so spare, till dangers appear; but when peril indeed comes, they get them gone.

These Grecians to retire his the retreat, advised Darius to retire his Army into the plain of Megastomias, to the end that Alexander being carried into those large fields and great Champaigns, he might have invironed the Macedonians on all sides with with his multitude; and withal they counselled him to divide that his huge Army into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might have fought many battels, and have brought no greater number at once than might have been well marshalled and conducted. But this Council was so contrary to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they persuaded Darius to inviron the Grecians which gave the advice, and to cut them in pieces as Traytors. The infinite wisdom of God doth not work always by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdoms and Estates, by taking understanding from the Governours, so as they can neither give nor discern of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander upon a straitened piece of ground, near unto the City of Issus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could (who by the advice of Parmenio stayed there, as in a place of best advantage) was utterly overthrown, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children, whom the Grecians his followers had persuaded him to leave in Babylon, or elsewhere taken prisoners, and all their Train of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queen, and her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexander's presence, were entertained with all respect due unto their birth, their Honours preserved, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored unto them, and though Darius's Wife was a most beautiful Lady, and his Daughters of excellent form, yet Alexander mistreated his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Arriobulus the Historian that he embraced the Wife of the valiant Mennon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Lycomedes, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobility of Persia in effect, fell into captivity; at which time also Darius's Treasure (not lost at Issus) was seized, amounting to six thousand and two hundred Talents of coin, and of Bullion five hundred Talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himself leaving his brother dead, with divers other of his chief Captains, (casting the Crown from his head) hardly escaped.

After this overthrow given unto Darius, all Phoenicia (the City of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Governor.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, Maritime Cities of great importance, of which one Straus was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast, that it trod on his heels; for Antigonus, Alexander's Lieutenant in Asia the less, overthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately revolted; Arriobdanes, Darius's Admiral, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly leaved; the Lacedemonians that warred against Antiper were beaten; four thousand of those Greeks which made the retreat at the last battle, forsaking both the party of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Egypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there, for the time was not yet come to divide Kingdoms.

Alexander to honour Ephesus, whom he loved most, gave him power to dispose of the Kingdom of Zidon. A man of a most poor estate, that laboured to sustain his life, being of the Royal blood was commended by the people unto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was becheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the same hour.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wist that he could bear his prosperity with the same moderation, and quietness of heart, that he had done his adversity; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not perform in himself that which he commended in another man's desire: for it was a sign that he did but accompany, and could not Govern his felicity.

While he made some stay in those parts; he received a letter from Darius, importing the ransom of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conquerour, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing in his direction, to file Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an overthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more scornful answer upon the offer of peace, than they did before the trial of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast leaf; the one a resolved, well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander diddained the offers of Darius, and sent him word, that he not only directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himself.

SECT. V.

How Alexander besieged and won the City of Tyre.

Alexander coming near the City of Tyre, received from them the present of a golden Crown, with great force of victuals and other presents, which he took very thankfully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a Sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their City, from whom he was descended. But the Tyrians like not his company within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was fated in the old City adjoining, now abandoned and desolate. To be short, Alexander resolved to enter it by force: and though it were a place in all men's opinion impregnable, because the Island whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Main, yet, with the labour of many hands, having great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, he filled the passage of the Sea between the Island and the Main, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea upon a storm of wind, sometimes by the Tyrians fired, and sometimes torn asunder, yet with the help of his Navy which arrived (during the siege) from Cyprus, he overcame all difficulties and prevailed, after he had spent seven months in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the Siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, persuading them to render the City, in respect whereof, and of the great loss of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those that escaped the fury, to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and reserved for slaves (saith Diodore) thirteen thousand. Arius, a Persian reckons them at thirty thousand. Many more had died, had not the Zidoniens, that served Alexander, conveyed great numbers by shipping unto their own City.

Happy it was for Apollis that the Town was taken: for one of the Tyrians having dreamt, that Jup. I. 18. this this god meant to forsake the City, they bound him fast with a golden chain to the Idol of Berolus; but Alexander like a gracious Prince, loosed him again.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprize, and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nebuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled up the channel that lay between the Island and the Main.

The Government of this Territory he gave to Tiblotas the Son of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Serates, and Andromachus Lieutenant under Parmenius; Ephraim had charge of the Fleet, and was directed to find Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

SECT. VI.

How Darius offered Conditions of Peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza, and deals graciously with the Jews.

IN the mean while Darius sends again to Alexander, lets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and layeth the loss of the last Battle to the Straitsness of the place: he hoped to terrify him by threatening to encompass him in the plain Countries, he bids him to consider, how impossible it was to pass the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearful things: for he that was now filled with nothing but fear, had arguments enough of that nature to prevent unto another. All the Kingdoms between the River of Alyr, and the Hellespont, he offered him in Dower with his beloved Daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his own, and that which victory and his own virtue had posited him of; That he was to give conditions, and not to receive any, and that he having posited the Sea it self, disdained to think of resistance in transporting himself over Rivers. It is said, That Parmenio, who was now old, and full of honour and Riches, told the King, That were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and coming before Gaza, Betis, a faithful servant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Town with an absolute resolution, at the siege whereof Alexander received a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his leg with a stone. He found better men in this place than he did at the former Battels; for he left to many of his Macedonians buried in the Sands of Gaza, that he was forced to fend for a new supply into Greece. Here it was, that Alexander first began to change condition, and to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entr'd Gaza by assault, and taken Betis (whom Josephus calleth Babonem) in that was weakened with many wounds, and who never gave ground to the Assaults; he bored holes thorow his feet, and caused him to be drawn about the street, whilst he was yet alive; who being as valiant a man as himself, disdained to ask either life or remission of his torments. And what had he to countenance this his Tyranny, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Heitor? It is true, that cruelty hath always somewhat to cover her deformity.

towards Jerusalem, a City, for the antiquity, and great fame thereof, well known unto him, while he lay before Tyre, he had sent for some supply thither, which Jaddus the High-Priest, being subject and sworn to Darius, had refused him. The Jews therefore fearing his revenge, and unable to resist, committed the care of their cities and safety to Jaddus, who, being taught by God, issued out of the City covered with his Pontifical Robes, to wit, an upper garment of Purple, embroided with gold, with his Mitre, and the plate of gold wherein the Name of God was written, the Priests and Levites in their rich Ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a manner so unusual, stately, and grave, as Alexander greatly admired it. Josephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the High-Priest, as reverencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it. However it was, I am of opinion, that he became so confident in his enterprize, and so assured of the success after the Prophecy of Daniel had been read unto him, wherein he saw himself, and the Conquest of Perfia so directly pointed at,
as nothing thenceforth could discourage him, or fear him. He confessed to Parmenio (saith Josephus) that in Dio a City of Macedon, when his mind laboured the Conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleep such a person as Jaddus, and so appalled, professing one and the same God; by whom he was encouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand, with assurance of victory. This apparition formally apprehended only by the light of his fantasy, he now beheld with his bodily eyes, wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and emboldened, as contrary to the practice of the Phoenicians (who he hoped to have sacked and destroyed Jerusalem) he gave the Jews all, and more than they desired, both of liberty and immunity, with permission to live under their own Laws, and to exercise and enjoy their own Religion.

SECT. VII.

Alexander wins Egypt: and makes a journey to the Temple of Hammon.

FROM Jerusalem, Alexander turned again towards Egypt, and entered it, where Darius his Lieutenant, Alaces, received him, and delivered into his hand the City of Memphis, with eight hundred Talents of Treasure, and all other the King's riches. By this we see, that the King of Perfia, who had more of affection than of judgment, gave to the valiantest men he had, but the command of one City, and to the weakest toward the Government of all Egypt. When he had set things in order in Egypt, he began to travel after God-head, towards Jupiter Hammon; so foolish had prosperity made him. He was to pass over the dangerous and dry Sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels backs was spent, he could not but have perished, had not a marvellous shower of rain fallen upon him, when his Army was in extrem'd despair. All men that know Egypt, and have written thereof, affirm, That it never rains there: but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to pass what he plea-seth him; for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those deserts, that a flight of Crows flew

flew before the Army; who making falter wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Army was call back, guided them over those pathless Sands to Jupiter's Temple.

Arrianus, from the report of Strabo, the Son of Lygus, says, That he was led by two Dragons; both which reports may be alike true. But many of those wonders and prodigious things, are feigned by those that have written the story of Alexander; as, That an Eagle lay hovering directly over his head at the battle of Issus; That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and would not be feared from him, till it had awakened him at Halicanassus, fore-shewing the treason of Aegropus, practised by Darius to have slain him; That from the Iron bars which the Tyrrians made their defensive Engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of blood; and that the like drops were found in a loaf of bread, broken by a Macedonian Soldier, at the same time; That a Turf of earth kill on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the Air. The Spaniards in the Conquest of the West Indies have many such pretty tales; telling how they have been afflicted in battle by the presence of our Lady, and by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I think themselves do hardly believe. The strangest thing that I have read of in this kind, being certainly true, was,
That the night before the battle at Nova, all the Dogs which followed the French Army, ran from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning upon them, as if they had been bred and reared by them all their lives, and in the morning following, Trivulzi and Tremulio, Generals for Levay, the twelfth, were by these imperial Switzers utterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idol of Jupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius: for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodytes on the South, between whom, and the Territory of Hammon, the Region Thebaic, or the superior Egypt, with the Mountains of Ly-bia, and the River of Nilus, are interjacent; and on the North he joys it to a Nation called Nassamones, who bordering the Sea-shore, live (saith he) upon the spoils of shipwreck: whereas the Temple or Grove of this Idol hath no Sea near it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Nassamones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica.

When Alexander came near the place, he sent some of his Parasites before him to pacifice the Priests attending the Oracle. That their answer might be given in all things, agreeable to his mad ambition; who affected the title of Jupiter's Son,
And who was saluted, Son of Jupiter, by the Devil's Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some think) defective in the Greek Tongue; For whereas he meant to say, O paidios, he said, O pai dios; that is, O Son of Jupiter, instead of O dear Son: for which Grammatical error he was richly rewarded, and a rumour presently spread, that the great Jupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his own.

He had heard that Perseus and Hercules had formerly consulted the Oracle: The one when he was employed against Gorgon, the other against Anteus and Buffris; and seeing those men had derived themselves from the gods, why might not he: By this it seems, that he hoped to make his followers and the World fools, though indeed he made himself one, by thinking to cover from the World's knowledge his vanity and vices; and the better to confirm his followers in the belief of his Deity, he had practised the Priests to give answer to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should be pleasing to Jupiter to honour Alexander as his Son.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a Bos carried in a Boat, by a Ram, or a Ram's head, I see that many wise men have troubled themselves to find out; but, as Arrianus speaks of Dionysius or Liber Pater (who lived, saith St. Augustine in Moses's time) Ea que de diis veteres fabulati sunt confiteri, non sunt nimium curiose persequenda;
We must not over-curiously search into the fables which the Ancients have written of their gods.

But this is certain and notable, that after the Gospel began to be Preached in the World, the Devil, in this, and all other Idols, became speechless. For, that this Ammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cæsar, and in the time of Trajan altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witness.

There is found near his Temple a Fountain called Four fountains (though Plutarch in his third African Table sets it farther off): that at Midnight it is as hot as boiling water, and at Noon as cold as any Ice; to which I cannot but give credit, because I have heard of some other Wells of like nature, and because it is reported by St. Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Pliny, Mela, Solinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others, and indeed our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night than in the day.

SECT. VIII.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemy.

FROM the Temple of Hammon he returned to Memphis, wherewith many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Parmenon, who belike understanding that he affected the title of Jupiter's Son, told him that God was the Father King of all men in general; and refining the pride of this haughty King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortal Men, but that he acknowledged none for his children, save good men.

He gave the charge of the several Provinces of Egypt, to several Governours, following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great dominion Asia should not be continued in the hands of any one; whom Pol. lib. 5.
therein the Roman Emperours also followed, not daring to commit the government of Egypt to a man of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank and degree. He then gave order for the founding of Alexandria upon the Westernmost branch of Nilus. And having now settled (as he could) the estate of Egypt, with the Kingdoms of the lesser Asia, Phoenicia, and Syria (which being but the pawns of Darius his ill fortune, one happy victory would readily have redeemed) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage, though the time was committed to Mazæus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance pass't it.
From thence he marched towards Tygris, a River for the swiftness thereof called by the Perfians, The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and reason it self tells us, might Darius easily have repelled the invading Macedonians; for the violent course of the stream was such, as it drove before it many weighty stones, and those that moved not, but lay in the bottom,

bottom, were so round and well polished by a continual rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing; nor the Macedonian footmen to waste the River, otherwise than by joining their hands, and embracing arms together, making one weighty and entire body to resist the swift passage, and furious rage of the stream. Besides this notable help, the Channel was so deep towards the Eastern shore, where Darius should have made head as the footmen were enforced to lift their Bows and Arrows, and Darts, over their heads to keep them from being noised, and made unserviceable by the Waters. But it was truly, and undeniably said of Flower,

Talis est hominum terribrium mens, Qualem quotidie ducit pater circumq; Deorum;

*The minds of men are ever so affected,
As by God's will they daily are directed.*

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the world, by the circuit of misgovernment have been subject to many evils, and sometimes mortal diseases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it self into a burning and consuming Fever, and thereby become frantic, and without understanding, fore-throwing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recovered the Eastern shores of Tygris, without any other difficulty, than that of the nature of the place, where Mazæus (who had charge to defend the Passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himself to the Macedonians, followed with certain companies of Horsemen, as if with even forces he durst have charged them on even ground, when as with a multitude far exceeding them, he forsook the advantage which no valour of his enemies could easily have overcome. But it is commonly seen, that fearful and cowardly men do ever follow those ways and counsels, whereof the opportunity is already lost.

It is true, that he set all provisions a fire, where-with the Macedonians might serve themselves over Tygris, thinking thereby greatly to have distressed them; but the execution of good counsel is fruitless, when unseasonable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competency of the Army which he conducted. Those things also which he fought to waste, Alexander being now in fight, were by his Horsemen saved and recovered. This Mazæus might have done some days before at good leisure; or at this time with so great a strength of Horsemen, as the Macedonians durst not have pursued them, leaving the strength of their foot out of fight, and far behind.

SECT. IX.

The new Provisions of Darius. Accidents foregoing the Battle of Arbela.

Darius, upon Alexander's first return out of Egypt, had assembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also the Arrians, Seythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (saith Curtius) that rather served to make up the names of men, than to make resistance. Arrians had numbered them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all sorts ten hundred thousand, and of horse four hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some few Elephants. Curtius, who numbers the Army of Darius at two hundred thousand foot, and nearly thousand Horse, comes (I think) nearer to the true number; and yet seeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassals, it is like enough that he had gathered together of all sorts some three or four hundred thousand, with which he hoped in those fair plains of Assyria, to have overcome the few numbers of the invading Army. But it is a rule in the Philosophy of the War;

In omni prelio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocita, quam ars & exercituum silent prestante victoriam; In every Battle skill and practice do more towards the Victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gave rest to his Army after the passage over Tygris, there happened an Eclipse of the Moon, of which the Macedonians not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude always are) took it for a certain presage of their overthrow and destruction, inasmuch as they began not only to murmur, but to speak it boldly; That for the ambition of one man, a man that did disdain Philip for his Father, and would needs be called the Son of Jupiter, they should all perish; for he not only enforced them to make War against worlds of enemies, but against Rivers, Mountains, and the Heavens themselves.

Hercupon, Alexander being ready to march forward, made a halt, and to quiet the minds of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Soldiers might be assured that this decision of the Moon was a certain presage of good success, for, that it was natural, they never imparted to the common people, but reserved the knowledge to themselves, so as a sorry Almanack-maker had been no small fool in those days.

Of this kind of superstitious observation Cæsar made good use, when he fought against Arriovivus, and the Germani: for they being persuaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moon, they should certainly lose the battle, Cæsar forced them to abide it, though they durst not give it; wherein, having their minds already beaten by their own superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Army in effect perished.

The Egyptians gave no other reason than this, That the Grecians were under the aspect of the Sun, the Persians of the Moon; and therefore the Moon falling and being darkened, the estate of Persia was now in danger of falling, and their glory of being obscured. This judgement of the Egyptian Priests being noised through all the Army, all were satisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the War, which, though devised since, was well observed then: Exercituum terrore plerumq; Deus ad pugnam non ducit; Let not a Captain lead his Army to the fight when it is possessed with matter of terror.

It is truly observed by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superstition; which we find it in all stories, and often in our own, that by such inventions, deviled tales, dreams and Prophecies, the people of this Land have been carried head-long into many dangerous rous tumults and insurrections, and still to their own loss and ruine.

As Alexander drew near the Persian Army, certain Letters were surprized, written by Darius to the Grecians, persuading them for great sums of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these, by the advice of Parmenio, he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his fair Wife, oppressed with sorrow, and wearied with travel, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no less to bewail than Darius, who upon the first bruit, suspected that some dishonourable violence had been offered her; but being satisfied by an Eunuch of his own that attended her, of Alexander's kindly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortal gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to confer it on fo joint and continent an Enemy as Alexander; to whom he once again, before the last trial by Battle, offered these conditions of Peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliver up, and resign all Asia the less; and, with Egypt, all those Kingdoms between the Phœnician Sea, and the River of Euphrates. That he would pay him for the Ransom of his Mother, and of his other Daughters, thirty thousand Talents, and that for the performance thereof, he would leave his Son Ochus in hostage: To this they sought to persuade Alexander by such arguments as they had. Alexander causing the Ambassadors to be removed, advised with his Council, but heard no man speak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who persuaded him to accept of these fair conditions. He told him, That the Empire between Euphrates and the Helle-spont, was a fair addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian Prisoners was a great cumbrance, and the treasure offered them for their far better use than their persons, with divers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable, that if he had followed his advice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might have lived as famous for Virtue, as for Fortune, and left himself a Successor of able age who have enjoyed his estate, which afterward indeed he much enlarged, rather to the greatening of others than himself: who, to assure themselves of what they had usurped upon his Issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few years after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so far into the East, left behind him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon, the reputation of a just and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, advised, and grateful: and being taught new Lessons by abundance of prosperity, became a lover of wine, of his own flattery, and of extreme cruelty. Yea, as Seneca hath observed, the taint of one unjust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beauty of all his great acts, and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Ambassadors lay his answer, which was to this effect, That whatsoever he had bestowed on the wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his own natural clemency and magnanimity, without any respect to their Vassals; but thanks to an enemy was improper: that he made no Wars against adversity, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Soldiers, and by great sums of money to persuade his friends to attempt upon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant; yet he could not (were it otherwise and faithful) resolve in hate to accept the same, seeing Darius had made War against him, not as a King with Royal and overt force, but as a Traitor by secret and base practice: That for the Territory offered him, it was already his own, and if Darius could beat him back again over Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then believe that he offered him somewhat in his own power: Otherwise he propounded to himself for the reward of the War which he had made, all those Kingdoms as yet in Darius's possession; wherein, whether he were abused by his own hopes or no, the Battle which he meant to fight in the day following should determine. For in conclusion he told them, that he came into Asia to give, and not to receive: That the Heavens could not hold two Suns; and therefore if Darius would be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superior, he might perchance be persuaded to give him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

SECT. X.

The Battle of Arbela: and that it could not be so strongly fought as report hath made it.

With this Answer the Ambassadors return to Darius prepares to fight, and sends Mazæus to defend a passage, which he never dared yet so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captains. Parmenio persuades him to force Darius his Camp by night; so that the multitude of enemies might not move terror in the Macedonians being but few. Alexander disdains to steal the Victory, and resolves to bring with him the daylight, to witness his valour. But it was the fœcals that made good Alexander's resolution, though the counsel given by Parmenio was more found: For it is a ground in War, Si pauci necessarij cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, confilium est, notis tempore belli fortunam tentare. Notwithstanding upon the view of the multitude at hand, he staggers and trenches himself upon a ground of advantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And Darius for fear of surprize had stood with his Army in Armour all the day, and forborn sleep all the night. Alexander gave his men rest and store of food; for reason had taught him this Rule in the War, In pugna Milites validius resistunt, si cibo potuque refecti fuerint, nam famem intrinsecus magis pugnat, quam feram exterius: Soldiers do the better stand to it in fight, if they have their bellies full of meat and drink; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than steel without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arrianus, were forty thousand foot, and seven thousand horse; these belike were of the European Army: for he had besides, both Syrians, Indians, Egyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of these Regions. He used but a short speech to his Soldiers to encourage them. And I think that he needed little Rhetoric; for by the two former Battles upon the River of Granick, and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Vittoria victoriam parat, animusque victoribus auget.

& adversarius aufert: One victory begets another, and puts courage into those that have already had the better, taking spirit away from those that have been beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this Battle, fought at Gangamela; They tell us of many charges, and re-charges; That the victory inclined sometimes to the Persians, sometimes to the Macedonians; That Parnonius was in danger of being overthrown who led the left wing; That Alexander's Rear-guard was broken, and his carriages lost; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both sides, Fortune herself was long unresolved on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, that Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retreat. But in conclusion, Curtius delivers us in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible day's work, saying, That Ephion, Perdiccas, and others of name were wounded. Arrianus finds not a third part of this number; that of the Persians there fell forty thousand; (saith Curtius) thirty thousand, according to Arrianus; ninety thousand, if we believe Plutarch. But what can we judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former Battles, the Persians upon the first charge ran away, and that the Macedonians pursued; For if those four or five hundred thousand Arians brought into the field by Darius, every man had cut but a dart or a stone, the Macedonians could not have brought the Empire of the East to so easy a rate, as six or seven hundred men in three notorious Battles. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander upon the banks of Euphrates, and had armed but fifty or threescore thousand of this great multitude, only with Spades (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had been impossible for Alexander to have past that River so easily, much less the River of Tigris. But as a man whole Empire God in his Providence had determined, he abandoned all places of advantage, and suffered Alexander to enter far into the bowels of his Kingdom, as all hope and possibility of escape by retreat being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented unto them the choice, either of death or victory, to which election Darius could no way constrain his own, seeing they had many large Regions to run into from those that invaded them.

SECT. XI.

Of things following the Battle of Arbela.
The yielding of Babylon and Susa.

Darius, after the rout of his Army, recovered Arbela the same night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded unto them that ran after him, his purpose of making a retreat into Media, persuading them that the Macedonians, greedy of spoil and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities filled with Treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobility rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander soon after Darius's departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great mass of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendered to him: for the fear which conducted Darius, took nothing with it but shame and dishonour. He that had been twice beaten, should rather have sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so near the place where he abideth the coming of his enemies; if he had been victorious, he might have brought it after him at leisure; but being overcome, he knew it unpollable to drive Mules and Camels laden with gold from the pursuing enemy, seeing himself, at the overthrow he had in Cilicia, cut the Crown from his head, to run away with the more speed. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable; Et præterea magis reprehendi possum quam corrigi; It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past.

From Arbela, Alexander took his way towards Babylon, where Mazæus, in whom Darius had most confidence, rendered himself, his Children, and the City. Also the Captain of the Castle who was keeper of the Treasure, threw the streets with flowers, burnt Frankincense upon Altars of silver, as Alexander passed by, and delivered unto him whatsoever was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Captain in great solemnity to entertain their new King: after these came the Babylonian horsemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poor in warlike furniture. Between these (though not greatly to be feared) and himself, Alexander caused his Macedonian footmen to march. When he entered the Castle, he admired the glory thereof, and the abundance of Treasure therein found, amounting to fifty thousand Talents of silver uncoined. The City it self I have elsewhere described, with the Walls, the Towers, the Gates and Circuit, with the wonderful place of pleasure about two miles in Circuit, surrounded with a wall of fourscore foot high, and on the top thereof (being under-born with Pillars) a Grove of beautiful and fruitful Trees, which it is said, that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built: that the Queen and other Princesses might walk privately therein. In this City, rich in all things, but most of all in voluptuous pleasures, the King reposed himself and the whole Army four and thirty days, consuming that time in banquetting, and in all sorts of effeminate exercise; which so much softened the minds of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the severe discipline of War, which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of painful travel, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Here it was that those bands of a thousand Soldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed over them, who thereupon were filled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honour those Captains which were found by certain selected Judges to have deserved best in the late War. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of five hundred. Certainly the drawing down of the foot-bands in this latter age hath been the cause (saith the Marshall Montfort) that the title and charge of a Captain hath been bestowed on every Pique Beauf, or Spurr-Cow, for when the Captains of foot had a thousand Soldiers under one Ensign, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honourable, and the Kings were less charged, and far better served. King Henry the eighth of good Ships, but to men of known valour, and of great estate; nay sometimes he made two Gentlemen of quality Commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe; for Antipater sent him six thousand foot, and five hundred horse out of Macedon; of Thracians three thousand foot and the like number of horse; and out of Greece four thousand and four hundred horse, by which his Army was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly be brought again, De quitter la plume pour servir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boards.

He left the Castle and City of Babylon, with the Territories about it, in charge with three of his own Captains, to wit, Agathon, Mineur, and Appollonius; to supply all wants, a thousand Talents, but to honour Mazæus, who rendered the City unto him, he gave him the title of his Lieutenant over all, and took with him Bagabates that gave up the Castle, and having distributed to every Soldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon, and entered into the Province Satrapene: from thence he went on toward Susa in Persia, the same which Plutarch, Herodotus, and Eliahu call Memnonia, situated on the River Euphrates, a City sometimes governed by David the Prophet. Abulites also, Governor of this famous City, gave it up to the Conqueror, with nity thousand Talents of silver in bullion, and twelve Elephants for the War, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this sort, did those Vassals of fortune, lovers of the King's prosperity, not of his person (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their own peace and safety with the King's treasures. And herein was Alexander well advised, that whatsoever titles he gave to the Persians, yet he left all places of importance in trust with his own Captains, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet living) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battle, all the Nobility of Persia would have returned unto their natural Lord. Those that are Traitors to their own Kings, are never to be used alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertain them, nor ever to be trusted with the defences of any Frontier-Town, or Fortifies of weight, by the rendering whereof they may redeem their liberty and estates lost. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Navarra, being banished out of Spain, was trusted with Fontenay, in the year 1523.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazæus might have furnished the King from Babylon; and while he stayed four and thirty days at Babylon, Abulites might have helped him from Susa; and while he feasted there, Tiridates from Persepolis might have relieved him; for the great mass of Treasure was laid up in that City. But who hath sought out and frequented fearful adversity? It is certain, that benefits bind not the ambitious, but the honest; for those that are greedy of themselves, do in all changes of fortune only consult the conservation of their own greatness.

The Government of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, he committed to his own Macedonian, making Abulites, who rendered it unto him, his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazæus and others; in giving them titles, but neither trust nor powers for leaving these thousand old Soldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius's mother and her children to repay themselves.

It is said that Charles the fifth, having promised Charles of Bourbon the Government of Marseilles, if he could have forced it, and whereof he made sure account, told some of his nearest Counsellors, that he meant nothing less than the performance of that promise, because he thought thereby have left the Duke (revolted from his Master) very well wherewithal to have recovered his favour.

SECT. XII.

How Alexander came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

From Susa, Alexander leadeth his Army toward Persepolis, and when he fought to pass those Mountains which hinder Susana and Persepolis, he was suddenly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended against him those Straits, called Pyle Persidis, or Susfide, and after the loss of many Companies of his Macedonian, was forced to save himself by retreat, causing his Foot to march close together, and to cover themselves with their Targets from the flames tumbled on them from the Mountain-top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, living in that Country discovered unto him, and came thereby suddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being enclosed to fight upon even ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis; but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receive him) he returned and gave a second charge upon the Macedonians, where-in he was slain. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the year 1515, find a way over the Alpes, the Swissers, undertaking to defend all the passages, who if their footmanhood had not saved them upon the King's descent on the other side, they had been ill paid for their hard lodging on those Hills.

Four thousand Greeks, saith Curtius, Julius numbers them at eight hundred) having been taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians foamed and delaced, by cutting off their hands, noses, ears, and other members, as they could no way have been known, to their Country-men, but by their voices; to each of these Alexander gave three hundred Crowns, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to live upon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false hearted Grandees, hearing of Alexander's approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receive him, and prayed him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoil the King's Treasure. This City was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants upon Alexander's arrival, and they that stayed followed the worst Councils; for all was left to the liberty of the Soldiers, to spoil and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which if it had been laid in the balance with Persepolis, would have weighed it down. Babylon indeed, and Susa were very rich, but in Persepolis lay the bulk and main store of the Persians. For after the spoil that had been made of money, curious Plate, Bullion, Images of Gold and Silver, and other Jewels, there remained to Alexander himself one hundred and twenty thousand Talents. He left the same number of three thousand Macedonian in Persepolis, which he had done in Susa, and gave the same formal honour to the Traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but but he that had the trust of the place was Nicærides, a creature of his own. The body of his Army he left here for thirty days, at which the Commanders were Pammenes and Cratæus, and with a thousand Horse, and certain Troops of chosen foot, he would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Perfe which the Snow had covered: a fruitless and foolish enterprise, but, as Seneca says: Non ille ire vult, sed non potest stare: He hath not a will to go, but he is unable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise, That when his Souldiers cryed out against him, because they could not endure the extrem frost, and make way, but with extrem difficulty, through the snow, that Alexander forsook his Horse, and led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring, other men into extremity, thereby to show how well himself can endure it? His walking on foot did no otherwise take off their weariness that followed him, than his sometimes forbearing to drink, did quench their thirst, that could less endure it. For mine own little Judgement, I shall rather commend that Captain that makes careful provision for those that follow him, and that seeks wisely to prevent extrem necessity, than those witleless arrogant fellows, that make the vaunt of having endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We had in all the Wars that Cæsar made, or of the best of the Roman Commanders, that the provision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Coligni, Admiral of France: That who will shape that Beast (meaning War) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians that were most amorous of his virtues, complain, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemency towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions were drowned in drink; That he smothered in carousing cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were from the reverend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of bawle Harlots, he began to be despised both of his own, and all other Nations. For being perfwaded, when he was inlamed with Wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Cabbie and City of Persepolis to be consumed with Fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Pammenes to the contrary, who told him, that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perfwasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perfwasion to the Affians, to think hardly of him, and thereby alien their hearts; for they might well believe that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing less than (after such variation) to hold their possession. Post violentiam crudelitas sequitur: Cruelty doth commonly follow Drunkenness: For it so fell out soon after, and often, in Alexander.

SECT. XIII.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

About this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Gilicia, and goes on to find Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Army, which he meant to have increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexander's coming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as he had, which were numbered at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once again to try his Fortune. He therefore calls together his Captains and Commanders, and propounds unto them his resolution, who being desperate of good success used silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of War, who had sometimes lived with Philip of Macedon, brake the ice, and protesting that he could never be beaten by any adversity of the Kings, from the faith which he had ever ought him, with firm confidence, that all the rest were of the same condition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) he approved the King's resolution. Two only, and those of the greatest, to wit, Nabuzanes and Bessus, whereof the later was Governor of Bactria, had conspired against their Master; and therefore advised the King to lay a new foundation for the War, and pursue by it some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an enemy: This preamble Nabuzanes used, and in conclusion advised the election of his fellow-Traitor Bessus, with promise that, the War ended, the Empire should again be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdain, prest towards Nabuzanes to have slain him, but Bessus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, withheld him. In the mean while Nabuzanes withdrew himself, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a part from the rest of the Army. Artabazus, the King's faithful servant, perfwaded him to be advised and serve the time, seeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at least make shew of forgetting the offence which the King, being of a gentle disposition, willingly yielded unto. Bessus makes his submission, and attends the King, who removes his Army. Patros, who commanded a Regiment of four thousand Greeks, which had in all the former battels served Darius with great fidelity, and always made the retreat in sight of the Macedonians, offered himself to guard his person, protesting against the Treason of Bessus; but it was not his destiny to follow their advice who from the beginning of the War gave him faithful counsel, but he inclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greeks, with Patros their Captain, were corrupted by Alexander, and practised the division of his faithful servants. Bessus had drawn unto him thirty thousand of the Army, promising them all those things, by which the lovers of the World, and themselves are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, safety, and honour.

Now the day following, Darius plainly discovered the purposes of Bessus, and being overcome with passion, as thinking himself unable to make head against these ungrateful and unnatural Traitors, he prayed Artabazus his faithful servant to depart from him, and to provide for himself. In like like sort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all save a few of his Eunuchs; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Persians being most bawle cowards, durst not undertake his defence against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had four thousand Greeks to joyn with him, who had been able to have beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forsakes himself, no man follows. It had been far more Man-like, and King-like, to have died in the head of those four thousand Greeks, which offered him the disposition of their lives, (to which Artabazus perfwaded him) than to have lien bewailing himself on the ground, and suffering himself to be bound like a slave, by those ambitious monsters that laid hands on him, where neither the consideration of his former great estate, nor the honour he had given them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could move to pity: no, nor his present adversity, which above all things should have moved them, could pierce their viperous and ungrateful hearts. Vain it was indeed to hope it; for, Invidious hath no compassion.

Now Barius, thus forsaken, was bound and laid in a Cart, covered with hides of Beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be discovered; and, to add despoilment and derision to his adversity, they fastned him with Chains of Gold, and drew him on among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Nabuzanes, perfwaded themselves to redeem their lives and the Provinces they held, either by delivering him a prisoner to Alexander, or, if that hope failed, to make themselves Kings by his slaughter; and then to defend themselves by force of Arms. But they failed in both. For it is against the nature of God, who is most just, to pardon so strange villany, yea, though against a Prince purely Heathenish and an Idolater.

Alexander having knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durst not abide his coming, halted after him with a violent speed, and because he would not force his footmen beyond their powers, he mounted on horse-back certain selected companies of them, and best armed, and with six thousand other Horse, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus, and secretly forsook him, gave knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus took, and how near he was at hand: for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander again doubled his pace, and his Vant-guard being discovered by Bessus his Rear, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perfwading him to mount thereon, and to save himself. But the unfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, and flew two poor servants that attended his person. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the rest to the mercy of the Macedonian sword.

Polytratus a Macedonian, being by pursuit of the vanquished prest with thirst, as he was refreshing himself with some water that he had discovered, clyping a Cart with a Team of wounded beasts breathing for life, and not able to move, searched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his own blood: And by a Persian Captive which followed this Polytratus, he understood that it was Darius, and was informed of his barbarous Treachery. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the living God can be comforted) that he cast not out his last sorrows unhealed, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traitors, which had dealt no less unworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their revenge to Alexander by this messenger, which he brought him to pursue, not because Darius had desired it, but for his own honour, and for the safety of all that did, or should after wear Crowns. He also having nothing else to present, rendered thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace used towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, desiring the immortal gods to submit unto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus speaking, impatient Death pressing which Polytratus presented him, after which he lived but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, wherewith to desire the gods to reward his compassion.

SECT. XIV.

How Alexander pursued Bessus, and took in to his grace Darius his Captains.

It was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their travels were near an end, every man preparing for his return. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieved, for the bounded earth sufficed not his boundless Ambition. Many arguments he therefore used to draw on his Army farther into the East, but that which had most strength was, that Bessus, a most cruel Traitor to his Master Darius, having at his devotion the Hyrcanians and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should return) make himself Lord of the Persian Empire, and enjoy the fruits of all their former travels. In conclusion he won their contents to go on: which done, leaving Cratæus with certain Regiments of foot, and Amynas with six thousand Horse in Parthia, he enters not without some opposition into Hyrcania; for the Mardians, and other barbarous Nations, defended certain passages for a while. He passed the River of Zisberis, which taking beginning in Partia, discharges it self in the Caspian Sea: it runneth under the ledge of Mountains, which bound Partia and Hyrcania, where hiding it self under ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth again, and followeth its former course. In Zadrascarta, or Zendacarta, the same City which Ptolemy writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, he rested fifteen days, banqueting and feasting there.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with others of his best followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and Governments. But of all others he graced Artabazus most highly for his approved and constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and five hundred Greeks, the remainder of all those that had served Darius: He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end, they render themselves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedemonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader having slain himself. He was also wrought (though to his great

At this time it was that the Treason of Dimnus broke out, of which Philotas, the Son of Parnenio was accused, as accessory, if not principal. This Dimnus, having (I know not upon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a young man whom he loved, into the same Treason. The Youth, although he was first bound by oath to fidelity, when he heard so foul a matter uttered, began to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to have slain him for security of his own life. So, constrained by fear, he made flew as if he had been won by persuasion; and by tarrying at length to like well of the business, he was told more at large what they were that had undertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of rank, whose names Dimnus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned up to Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no sooner freed himself from the company of this Traitor Dimnus, than he acquainted his own Brother Cebalinus with the whole History: whereupon it was agreed between them, that Cebalinus (who might with least suspicion should go to the Court, and utter all. Cebalinus, meeting him to acquaint the King therewith: which he promised to do, but did not. Two days passed, and Philotas never broke with the King about the matter, but still excused himself to Cebalinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldness bred suspicion, and caused Cebalinus to address himself to another, one Mitron, Keeper of the Kings Armory, who forthwith brought him to Alexander's presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed between Cebalinus and Philotas, did fully perfwade himself that this concealment of the Treason, argued his hand to have been in the business. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question than this: Wherein have I so offended thee, that thou shouldst think Philotas more worthy to be a King than I? Dimnus perceiving when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had fo wounded himself, that he lived no longer, than to give his last groan in the King's presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspicion, which his silence might justly breed. His answer was, That when the practice was revealed unto him by Nicomachus, he judging it to be but frivolous, did forbear to acquaint Alexander therewithal, until he might have better information. This error of his, (if it were only an error) although Alexander, for the notorious services of his Father Parnenio, of his Brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himself, had freely pardoned and given him hand for assurance; yet by the instigation of Craterus, he again swallowed his Princely promise, and made his enemies his Judges. Curtius gives a note of Craterus in this business: How he perfwaded himself that he could never find a better occasion to oppress his private enemy, than by pretending Piety and Duty towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our own hath given a note as much better, as it is most general, in his Philotas.

In these fair colours of the public good;
And, to affect their ends, pretend the State,
At if the State by their affection flood:*

*And arm'd with Power and Princes jealousy,
Will put the least conceits of discontent
Into the greatest rank of treacheries,
That no one action shall seem innocent:
Trea, valour, honour, honesty shall be made
As accessories unto ends unjust:
And even the service of the State must laide
The needfull undertaking with distrust;
So that base vilest, idle Luxury,
Seem safer far, than to do worthily, &c.*

Now, although it were so, that the King, following the advice of Craterus, had resolved the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very evening, he called him to a Banquet, and discomfited as familiarly with him, as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him began to bind him, he cried out upon the King in these words: *O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath furmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is far more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were urged against him by Alexander himself (for the King of Macedonia did in person examine the accusations of Treason) and this was not the least (not the least offence, indeed, against the King's humour, who desired to be glorified as a god.) That when Alexander wrote unto him concerning the title given him by Jupiter Hammon, He answered, That he could not but rejoice, that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the gods, and yet he could not but withal grieve for those that should live under such a one as would exceed the nature of man. This was (said Alexander) a firm perfwasion unto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in despite. See what a strange Monster Flattery is, that can perfwade Kings to kill those that do not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude to hear the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vile garments, and bound like a Thief; where he heard himself, and his absent Father, the greatest Captain of the World, accused; his two other Brothers, Hedior and Nicanor having been lost in the present War. He was so greatly oppressed with griefs for a while he could utter nothing, but tears and sorrow had so waisted his spirits, as he sank under those that led him. In the end, the King asked him, In what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the King to accuse him; which he did, to the end that the Perfians, as well as the Macedonians, might understand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perfwading the assembly, that he did disdain the language of his own Country, and fo withdrawing himself, left him to his merciless enemies.*

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, seeing the King, who had so sharply inveighed against him, would not vouchsafe to hear his excuse. For not his enemies only were emboldened thereby against him, but all the rest, having discovered the King's disposition and resolution, contended among themselves, which of them should exceed in hatred towards him. Among many other arguments, which he used in his own defence, this was not the weakest; That when Nicomachus desired to know of Dimnus, what men of mark and power were his partners in the conspiracy (as seeming unwilling to adventure himself with mean and base Companions) Dimnus named named unto him Demetrius of the King's Chamber, Nicanor, Amynas, and some others; but (pale not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly have valued the party, and have encouraged Nicomachus. Indeed, as Philotas said well for himself, it is likely that Dimnus, thereby the better to have heartened Nicomachus, would have named him, though he had never dealt with him in any such practice. And for more certain proof, that he knew nothing of their intents that practised against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, forced by torments, or otherwise, that could accuse him; and it is true, that adversity being seldom able to bear her own burthen, is for the most part found so malicious, as the rather desires to draw others (not always deservingly) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howsoever it were, to avoid the extremity of restless and unnatural torments, devised by his profect enemies Craterus, Centus, Ephelion, and others; Philotas accused his own self, being perfwaded they would have slain him forthwith. But he failed even in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be laid on flesh and blood, he was forced to deliver, nor was he knew, but whatsoever best pleased their ears, that were far more merciless than death it self.

Of this kind of judicial proceeding Sen. Aug. gustine greatly complaineth, as a matter to be bewailed, faith he, with Fountains of tears, Quid cum in sua causâ quisque torquetur? &c. cum exercitur utrum sit nocens, cruciatur; & innocent laici per incerto scelere, certissimas penas: non quia illud commissi detegitur sed quia non commissi nescitur. What shall we say to it, when one is put to torture in his own cause, and tormented whilst yet it is in question whether he be guilty, and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is no certainty: not because he is known to have committed the offence, but because others do not know that he hath not committed it?

It had been enough for Alexander's safety, if Philotas had been put to death without torment, the rest would not much have grieved thereat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemulus, who afterwards conspired against him, made the King's cruelty and delight in blood, the greatest motive of his own ill intent. Therefore, Seneca speaking of Alexander, faith thus: Cruelitate minime humanum malum est, indignum tam mihi animo; ferina iam rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abjecto homine, in silvisque animal transfere. Cruelty is not a humane vice, it is unworthy of so milde a spirit: It is even a beastly rage to delight in blood and wounds, and calling away the nature of man, to become a savage Monster.

For the conclusion of this Tragedy, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philotas made, were to give end to the torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the same was true indeed: For (faith he) in this case, they that speak truly, or they that deny falsely, come to one and the same end. Now while the King's hands were yet wet in blood, he commanded that Lycostes, Son-in-law to Antipater, who had been three years in prison, should be slain: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected because they had followed Philotas; but when they had answered for themselves, that they knew no way to direct to win the King's favour, as by loving those whom the King favoured, they were difficult.

But Parnenio was yet living; Parnenio, who had served with great fidelity as well Philip of Macedonia the King's Father, as himself, Parnenio, that first opened the way into Asia; that had depicted Attalus the King's enemy; that had always, and in all hazards, the leading of the King's Van guard, that was no less prudent in counsel, than fortunate in all attempts: A man beloved of all the men of War, and to satisfy the truth, he that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glory and fame he had: That he might not therefore revenge the death of his Son, though not upon the King (for it was unlikely that he would have dishonoured his fidelity in his eldest age, having now lived threecore and ten years) yet upon those that by the witchcraft of flattery had posset themselves of his affection, it was resolved, that he should be dispatched. Polydamas was employed in this business, a man whom of all other Parnenio trusted most, and loved best, who (to be short) finding him in Media, and having Cleander and other murderers with him, slew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the King's Letters. Hic exitus Parnenionis fuit, militie domique clari viri; Multa iure Reges prosperi, Rex sine illo nihil magne rei esset. Lib. 7. This was the end of Parnenio (faith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King; but the King, without him, did never effect any thing worthy of praise.

SECT. XVII.

How Alexander subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Bessus was delivered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

When these things had end, Alexander went on with his Army, and brought under his obedience the Arapians, or Evergians; he made Amendius (sometime Darius his Secretary) their Governor, then he subdued the Arachosians, and left Mentus to command over them. Here the Army, sometimes led by Parnenio, finds him, consisting of twelve thousand Macedonians and Greeks, with whom he past through some cold Regions with difficulty enough. At length he came to the foot of the Mountain Taurus towards the East, where he built a City, which he honoured with his own name, and peopled it with seven thousand of his oldest Macedonians, worn with age, and with travels of the War. The Arapians, who since he left them were revolted, he subdued again by the industry and valour of Caranus and Erigenus. And now he resolves to find out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his coming, prepares to pass over the great River of Oxus, which divides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Governor of Bactria abandoned by Bessus. The Macedonian Army suffereth for want of water, inasmuch as when they came to the River of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, than Alexander had lost in any one Battle against the Perfians. And it may well be; For (as Clytus did after object unto him) he fought against women, and not against men; and not against their persons, but their shadows. He sifted on the Banks of this great great River no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boats, bridges or raff, but was forced to few together the hides that covered his carriages, and stoff then with straw, and on them in six days to pass over his Army; which Bessus might easily have done, if he had dared but to behold the Macedonian Army a far off. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tygris, and other passages; and yet now, when this traitorous slave had killed himself a King, he durst not perform any thing worthy of a slave. And therefore those that were nearest unto him, and whom he most trusted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Cataner, and others the Commanders of his Army, moved both by the care of their own safety, and by the memory of Bessus his treason and cruelty against Darius, bound him in the like manner, that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chain clofed about his neck like a Mastiff Dog, and to was dragged along to be presented to his Enemy.

In the mean while Alexander was arrived at a certain Town inhabited with Greeks of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before he returned out of Greece, whose Issues had well-near forgotten their Country language. These most cruelly (after they had received him with great joy) he put to the Sword, and destroyed their City. At this place he received Bessus, and having rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that delivered him, gave the Traitor into the hands of Oxartes, Darius his Brother, to be tormented.

But while he now thought himself secure, some twenty thousand Mountaineers assaulted his Camp; in repelling whom he received a shot in the leg, the arrow-head sticking in the flesh, so he was carried in a Horse-litter, sometime by the Horsemen, sometime by the Foot.

Soon after he came unto Maracanda, which Petrus Erondinus takes to be Samarcanda, the regal City of the great Tamerlain. It had in compass threecore and ten furlongs (Curtius faith, Here he received the Ambassadors of the Scythians (called Avians) who offered to serve him.

The Bactrians are shortly again with the Sogdians stirred to rebellion, by the same Spitamenes and Cataner, who had lately delivered into his hands the Traitor Bessus. Many Cities were resolutely defended against him, all which, after victory, he attacked and razed, killing all therein. At one of these he received a blow on the neck, which struck him to the ground, and much disabled him for many days after. In the mean while Spitamenes had recovered Maracanda, against whom he employed Menedemus with three thousand foot, and eight hundred horse.

In the heat of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may believe Curtius and others) till he came to the River of Tanais; upon whose bank he built another Alexandria, threecore furlongs in compass, which he beautified with houses within seventeen days after the walls built. The building of this city is said to have been occasion of a War between him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perfwaded himself, that this new Town was fortified of purpose to keep him under. I do not well understand, why the Scythians, offering war in such a terrible manner, that Alexander was judged by his own Souldiers to counterfeite sickness for very fear, should nevertheless make suit for peace; neither find I the reason why Alexander

(not intending the Conquest of those Northern defarts, but only the defence of his own bank) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a greater matter; and a victory described; in pursuit of which the Macedon ran beyond the bounds and monuments of Euxetur his Expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus have greatly mistaken this River, which they call Tanais. For it was the River of Jaxartes, that runs between Sogdians and Scythia, which Alexander pass over, while Menedemus was employed in the recovery of Samarcand: But Tanais, which divides Asia from Europe, is near two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria and Sogdians, and the way defart and unknown. So that Alexander had (besides Jaxartes) the great River of Volga, and many others to swim over, ere he could recover Tanais: which (from the place where he was) he could hardly have discovered with the Army that followed him, if he had employed all the time that he lived in Asia in that travel.

Wherefore it is enough to believe, that the Asiaticque Scythians, making some offer to disturb the erection of his new City, which was like to give some hindrance to their excursions, were driven away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defensive Arms, easily chased some ten or twelve miles; which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his journey, like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life-time he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken god) went not very far into that waste Country, where he could find nothing but trees and stones, nor other business than to set up a Monument.

Threecore of the Macedonians are said to have been slain, and one thousand one hundred hurt in this fight, which might easily be in passing a great River, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythians hories one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Camp, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeed it is hardly possible, to set down the numbers of such as perished in Battel; yet Cæsar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the Victors hath been to inquisitive into the greatness of their own success, that Writers have been able to deliver such particulars by credible report, I hold it not unlawful to set down what we find; especially when it serves to give light to the business in hand. The small number which the Macedonians lost, the omission of the number which they slew (a thing not usual in Curtius, who forbears nothing that may set out the greatness of Alexander) and the little booty that was gotten, do make it probable, that this War was no better than the regulation of a few roving Tartars (the like being yearly performed by the Moscovites, without any boat) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was assuring himself of those Scythians bordering upon Jaxartes, he received the ill news that Menedemus was slain by Spitamenes, the Army (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slain, to wit, two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appease the rebellion, and to take revenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes flees into Bactria, Alexander kills, burns, and lays waste all before him, not sparing the innocent children, and do departs, leaving a new Governor in that Province.

SECT. XIX.

How Alexander slew his own Friends.

AFTER these Sogdian and Scythian Wars, we read of Alexander's killing of a Lycon, and other trifling matters; and that he committed the Government of Maracanda, and the Country about it, to Clytus, and how he slew him soon after, for valuing the virtue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the son, or rather because he objected to the King the death of Parmanis, and decided the Oracle of Hannum: for therein he toucht him to the quick, the same being delivered in publick, and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus indeed, had behaved as much at the King's hands, as any man living had done, and had in particular saved his life, which the King well remembered, when he came to himself, and when it was too late. Yet, to say the truth, Clytus his infidelity was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgot whom he offended, so the King in his (for neither of them were themselves) forgot whom he went about to flay: For the grief whereof, he ture his own face, and forrowed to inordinately, as, but for the exertions of Callisthenes, it is thought he would have slain himself.

Wine begat Fury, Fury matter of Repentance: But preceding mischiefs are not amended by succeeding bewailing: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit; obstantem malis consilium succedendum non movet; ubi passidit animum nimia res vini, quicquid mali latebat, emergit; non facit ebrietas vitia, sed prout vitia; Drunkenness both kindles and lays open every vice, it removes one of the ways that flame which gives impediment unto bad attempts; where Wine gets the mastery, all the ill that before lay hidden break out: Drunkenness indeed rather discovers vices than makes them.

Soon after this, Spitamenes, who slew Bessus, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dacotæ also seized upon his Fellow-Conspirator Dataphernes and delivered him too. So Alexander being now freed from all these petty Rebels, disposed of the Provinces which he paid over, and went on with his Army into Gabaza, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storm, as he lost in one Tempest a thousand of his Train. From hence he invaded the Sacææ, and destroyed their Country. Then came he into the Territory of Cobartanes, who submitted himself unto him, feasted him greatly, and presented him with thirty beautiful Virgins, among whom Roxana, afterwards his Wife, was one; which although all the Macedonians disdained, yet none of them durst use any freedom of speech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his course towards India, having fo increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand armed men.

In the mean while he would needs be honoured as a god; whereof that he might allege the Macedonians employed two pernicious Parasites Hægis and Cleo, whom Callisthenes opposed: For, among many other homely Arguments used to the Assembly, he told Cleo, That he thought, that Alexander would disdain the gift of God-head from his Vassals; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometime follow the death of those, who in their life life time had done the greatest things, yet it never accompanied any one as yet living in the world. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a Banquet, and upon drink (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a carousing Feast :) but that, for the more than many Acts by them performed while they lived, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbered among the gods. Alexander flood behind a partition, and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunity to be revenged on Calisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honour, learning, and a lover of the King's honour, was yet from after tormented to death; not for that he had betrayed the King to others, but because he would never consent to betray the King to himself, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracy against the King made by one Hermolus and others (which they confest) he caused Calisthenes without confession, accusation or Trial, to be torn asunder upon the Rack: This deed unworthy of a King, Seneca thus censureth, Hoc est Alexandri crimen atrocius, quod nulla virtus, nulla belorum faciliarum redimet: Nam puerum qui iuxta Occidit Persarum multa militis, opponit, & Calisthenem. Quoties dictum erit, Occidit Darium: opponitur, & Calisthenem. Quoties dictum erit, Oceanus tenuit vitem, ipsum quoque tenuit vitis claustrum, & Imperium ex angulo Tracia usque ad orientis terminus protulit, dicitur flet Calisthenem occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla transferat, ex his que fecit nihil tam magnum erit quam scelus Calisthenis: This is the eternal crime of Alexander, which no virtue nor felicity of his in War shall ever be able to redeem: For as often as any man shall say, He flew many thousand Persians; it shall be replied, He did so, and he slew Calisthenes. When it shall be said, he flew Darius, it shall be replied, and Calisthenes. Wherein shall he said he won all as far as the very Ocean, thereon also he adventured with unsuccessful Naxos, and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the utmost bounds of the Orient. It shall be said withal, But he killed Calisthenes. Let him have out-gone all the ancient examples of Captains and Kings; none of all his Acts make so much to his glory, as Calisthenes to his reproach.

SECT. XX.

Of Alexander's journey into India. The Battle between him and Porus.

With the Army before remembered, of one hundred and twenty thousand foot and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselves unto him, he entertained lovingly, the rest he constrained, killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they resisted. He then came before Nisa, built by Bacchus, which after a few days was rendered unto him. From thence he removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens, filled with delicate Fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom he made Feasts for ten days together. Now when he had drank his fill, he went on towards Dadala, and from thence to Acadera, Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants; by reason whereof, victuals failing, he divides his Army: Ptolemy led one part, Cenon another, and himself the rest. They take many Towns, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazage, which had in it three hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yielded unto him by Cleopatra the Queen, to whom again he restored it: at the siege of this City he received a wound in the Leg. After this, Nora was taken by Polyperchon, and a Rock of great strength by himself: he wan also a passage upon one Eryx, who was slain by his company, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the sum of Alexander's doings in those parts, before such time as he arrived at the River of Indus. Coming to Indus, he found there Ephibion, who (being first before) had prepared Boats for the transportation of his Army, and King's arrival, had persuaded Cynipis and other of that part of the Country, to submit himself to this great Conquerour. Therefore, soon upon Alexander's coming, Ombis presented himself with all the strength of his Country, and six and fifty Elephants, unto him; offering him his service and alliance. He made Alexander know, that he was an Enemy to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abisares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this dis-union to make his own victory by far the more ealie. He presented Alexander with a Crown of Gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withal fourscore Talents of Silver money, which Alexander not only refused, but to show that he was covetous of glory, not of gold, he gave Ombis a thousand Talents of his own Treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abisares having heard that Alexander had received his enemy Ombis into his protection, resolved to make his own peace also: For, knowing that his own strength did but equal that of Ombis, and that there was no other difference between them, than that which the chance of War gave, he thought it an ill match, when Alexander, who had already beaten under foot all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himself a Furry and Head of the quarrel. So had Alexander now none to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a commandment, that he should attend him at the border of his Kingdom, there to do him homage. But from Porus he received this manly Answer; That he would satisfy him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement he would take counsel of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolves to pass over the River Hydaspes, and to find Porus at his own home. Porus attends him on the farther bank with thirty thousand foot, fourscore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great Troop of Horse. If Darius had done the like on this side he had been surelyayed somewhat longer ere he had been India. The River was four furlongs broad, which makes half a mile, and withal deep and swift. It had in it many Islands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacity. Alexander sent Ptolemy up the River with a part of the Army, throwing the rest from the view of Porus: who by this device being drawn from his first encamping, sets himself down opposite to Ptolemy, supposing that the whole Army of Macedonians, meant to force their passage there. In the mean while Alexander recovers the farther shore without resistance. He orders his Troops, and advances towards Porus, who at first rather believes that Abisares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had been come over Hydaspes to his aid, than that Alexander had past it. But he finds it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hagis with with four thousand Horse, and a hundred armed Waggon to entertain him. Each Waggon had in it four to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little use: for there had fallen so much rain, and thereby the fields were so moistened, as the horses could hardly trot. The Scythians and Darius had the Vant-guard, who so galled these Indians, as they brake their Reins, and other Furniture, overturning the Waggon, and those in them. Perdiceus also gave up the reins to his men, and the one and the other were forced to retreat. Porus moves forward with the grove of his Army, that those of his Vant-guard scattered might recover his Rear; Alexander being followed with Ephelion, Ptolemy, and Perdiceus, took on him to charge the Indian horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenon, or Cenon to invade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus, he directed to break upon Porus his battel of foot, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himself being carried upon one of them, of the greatest stature. By these beafts the Macedonian foot were most offended, but the Archers and Darters being well guarded by the long and strong pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them, as being enraged, they turned head, and ran over the foot that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtful fight, by the advantage of weapon, and by the courage and skillfulness of the Macedonian Captains, the Victory fell to Alexander, who also far exceeded Porus in number: For besides the Macedonians, and other Eastern and Northern Nations, Porus was assailed by his own Confederate and Country-people. Yet for his own person he never gave ground other wise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Army, he became a prisoner to the Conquerour, from whom again he received his Estate with a great enlargement.

SECT. XXI.

How Alexander finished his Expedition, and returned out of India.

I Forbear to trouble my self and others with a frivolous discourse of Serpents, Asps, and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in their Travels: or of those petty Wars which Alexander made between the overthrow of Porus, and his falling down the River of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better known unto us in this Age, by means of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no fort be persuaded to believe, till our own experience had taught us, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seen between London and Stanes.

Our great Traveller Mandeville, who died in the year, 1372, and had seen so much of the World, and of the East-Indies, we accounted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witness the Monument made of him in the Covent of the Friars Guillelmus in Liege, where the Religious of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de son Excellence: For an honourable memory of his Excellency, faith Guiscardiene.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hydaspes, Zaradis, Aceines, and the rest fall into the main stream, are now posset by the great Mogul the ninth from Tamberlain, who commands all the Tract between Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Country towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Alexson, a Ship of London directed shipwreck, in the year 1609, and some of the company travelled over Land till they came to Agra, the same great city (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Dionysopolis.

Philobates in the Life of Apollonius Tyanicus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East-India, tells us, that those two great Captains (whom Alexander fought by all means to out-fame) when they endeavoured to subdue to them the Oxidrace, a people inhabiting between the Rivers of Hyphasis and Ganges, they were beaten from the assault of their City with Thunder & Lightnings. This may well be understood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in use. For it is now certainly known, that the great Kings of the uttermost East, have had the use of the Cannon many hundreds of years since, and even since their first civility and greatness, which was long before Alexander's time. But Alexander pierced not so far into the East. It sufficed, that having already over-wearied his Army, he discovered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Agremenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the River Ganges, was the powerfulst King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more enflamed than ever to proceed in this discovery and conquest, yet all the Art he had, could not persuade the Soldiers to wander over those great Desarts, beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible unto them than the greatest Army that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many persuasive Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was nearer at hand, wherunto the River of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, devised a pretty trick, wherewith he hoped to beguile potterity, and make himself seem greater than he was. He enlarged his Camp, made greater Trenches, greater Cabins for Soldiers, greater Horse-halls, and higher Mansions than Horses could feed in. He sent the farthest of Men and Horses to be made larger all Furniture for use; and scattered these Armour and Bridle about his Camp, to be kept as Reliques, and wondered at by the Savages. Proportionable to these he raised up twelve great Altars to be the monument of his journey's end. This was a ready way to encrease the fame of his bignefs: to his greatness it could add nothing save a suspicion, that it was less than is thought, seeing he strove so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned again to the bank of Aceines, and there determined to set up his Fleet, where Aceines and Hydaspes encounter; where to settle by a fatter monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those Rivers two Cities: the one he called Nisaea, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloved Horse Bucephalus. Here again he received a fourth supply of six thousand Thracian Horse men, seven thousand Foot; and from his Lieutenant at Babylon, five and twenty thousand Annours garnished with silver and gold, which he distributed among his Soldiers. About these Rivers he won many Towns, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that in assaulting a City of the Oxidraceni, he leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; rales like those of Bevis of Southampton, frivolous and incredible. Finally, he pass'd down the River with his Fleet, at which time also the news came unto him of a Rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arrival of an hundred Ambassadors from a King of India, who submitted himself unto him. He treated these Ambassadors upon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuousity that could be devised, who, soon after their dispatch, returned again with a present of three hundred Horses, one hundred and thirty Waggon, and to each of them four Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, he sailed towards the South, pass'd through many obscure Nations, which did all yield unto him either quietly, or compelled by force; among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he took in this passage, Smos was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poisoned swords, with one of which Ptolomy, (succeeded by King of Egypt) was wounded, and cured by an herb which Alexander dreamt he had seen in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came near to the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a sudden shoofed one upon another by the flood, so on the Ebb they were left on the dry ground, and on the sandy banks of the River, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed; but after he had a few days observed well the course of the Sea, he pass'd out of the Rivers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned; and the better to inform himself, he sent Nearchus and Onesivertus, to discover the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his sixth book hath written this passage down the River of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessels in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were used therein, and other the marvellous provisions made.

Near the out-lets of this River, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eighteen days march from thence recovered Gedrosia, in which passage his Army suffered such misery for want of Food, that of a hundred and twenty thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse, which he carried into India nor the fourth part returned alive.

SECT. XXII.

Of Alexander's Riot, Cruelty, and Death.

From Gedrosia, Alexander led his Army into Carmania, and so drawing near to Persia, he gave himself wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice be hateful enough in it self, yet it always inflamed this King to cruelty. For (saith Curcius) the Hangman followed the Fast: for Al-

phes, one of his Provincial Governors, he commanded to be slain; for as neither did the excess of voluptuousness qualify his cruelty, nor his cruelty hinder in ought his voluptuousness.

While he refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of five thousand foot, and a thousand horse was brought him by Cleander, and his Fellows that had been employed in the killing of Parmenis. Against these Murderers, a great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Provinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outrageous, as Alexander was perfwaded, that had they not altogether despaired of his return out of India they durst not have committed them. All men were glad of this occasion, remembering the virtue of him whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chief delinquents, were taken and employed, were delivered over to the Hangman: every one rejoicing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the Ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesivertus were now returned from the Coast, and made report of an Island rich in gold and of other strange things; whereupon they were commanded to make some farther discovery: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Euphrates, and find the King at Babylon.

As he drew near to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now called Chalcedonia: where he was presented with many rich gifts by Organes, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race descended from Cyrus. But because Bagoas, an Eunuch in special favour with the King, was neglected; he not only practised certain loose fellows to witness against Organes, that he had robbed Cyrus's Tomb, for which he was condemned to die; but he assailed the Hangman with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Philotas to be slain, suspecting his greatness. Caperas (saith Curcius) esse precepti ad reprehendam supplicia, item ad deteriora credenda; He began headlong to shed blood, and believe false reports. It is true, that he took a way to make all men weary of his Government, seeing cruelty is more fearful, than all adventures that can be made against it.

At this time it is said, that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himself, when he had lived threescore and thirteen years. Whether herein he followed the custom of his Country, being an Indian, or sought to prevent the grief and incommodity of old age, it is uncertain; but in this Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-shewing Alexander's death, he promised to meet him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargada he came to Susa, where he married Statira Darius his Eldest Daughter, giving her younger sister to his beloved Ephelion, and four-score other Persian Ladies to his Captains, there were six thousand guests invited to the Feast to each of which he gave a cup of gold. Here there came unto him three thousand young Soldiers out of his conquered Provinces, wherewith the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus his Treasurer in Babylon, having lawfully consumed the moneys in his keeping, got him going with five thousand Talents; and six thousand hired Soldiers: but he was rejected in Greece, and there slain. Alexander greatly rejoiced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stir: yet he sent commandment that they should again receive their banished men, whereunto (fearful of his indignation) all submitted themselves.

themselves (except the Athenians) though they relolved that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this, there followed a marvellous discontentment in his Army, because he had relolved to send into Macedon all thole old Soldiers which could no longer endure the travel of War, and to keep the rest in Asia. He used many Orations to fascinate them, but it was in vain during the Tempest of their fury. But afterward as Whales are drawn to the Land with a wine-drift, when they have tumbled a while, so are the undisciplinate multitude easily conducted when their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licenced to depart, he sent Craterus, to whom he gave the Lieutenantship of Macedon, Thessaly, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeks in his absence, discharged the trust committed unto him with great fidelity, and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainly, if Alexander had not taken counsel of his cups, he would have cast some better colour on this alteration, and given Antipater a stronger reason for his remove, than to have employed him in the conclusion of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the War being now at an end. For Antipater law nothing in this remove, but the King's disposition to send him after Parmenis, and therewith. With this Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though jealous, do not stand in doubt of every man ill affected, though valiant; but there is a kind of Kingly courage compounded of hardiness and under-taking, which is many times so fearful unto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themselves therof.

After he had sent for Antipater, he made a journey into Media to settle things there; where Ephelion whom he favoured most of all men, dies. The King, according to the greatness of his love, laments his loss, hangs his Physician, and bestows upon his Monument twelve thousand Talents: After which he returns to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but sent; and not to excuse himself, but to free himself. For if we believe Curcius (whom Plutarch and others gain say) Antipater by his Sons, Cassander, Philip, and Lolla, who waited on Alexander's cup, gave him poison; Thessalus (who was of the Conspiracy) having invited him to a drinking Feast for purpose. For after he had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drink brought him Hercules himself, he quitted the World within a few days.

Certainly the Princes of the World have seldom found good, by making their Ministers over great and thereby suspicious to themselves. For he that doth not acknowledge himself to be a debt, but is persuaded, that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassals, will never please himself with the price given. The only reletorative, indeed, that strenghtens it, is the goodness and virtue of the Prince, and his liberality makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be observed. It may be that Antipater, having commanded two or three Kingdoms ten or twelve years, knew not how to play any other part; so more than Cesar did, after he had so long a time governed the Gauls, while he utterly forgot the Art of obedience. A most cruel and ungrateful Traitor Antipater was, if Curcius do not belie him: For though he feared some ill measure upon his remove (the Trajectories of Parmenis, Clytus, and Calpithenes, having been fo lately affected) yet he knew nothing to the contrary, but that the King had relolved to have given him some other great Government in Asia: The old Soldiers these returned, having perchance desired to be governed by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former War.

SECT. XXIII.

Of Alexander's Person and Qualities.

Howsoever it were Alexander's former cruelties cannot be excused no more than his vanity to be esteemed the Son of Jupiter, with his excessive delight in drink and drunkennells, which others make the cause of his Fever and death. In that he lamented his want of enterprising, and grieved to consider what he should do when he had conquered the World, Aurelius Caesar found just cause to decide him, as if the well governing of so many Nations and Kingdoms, as he had already conquered, could not have afforded him a matter more than abundant, to busie his brains withal. That he was both Learned, and a lover of Learning, it cannot be doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his first Book of the Advancement of Learning, hath proved it sufficiently. His liberality I know not now to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gave a whole City to one of his servants, he, to whom it was given did out of modesty refuse it, as disproportionate to his fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That he did not enquire what became him to accept but the King to give: of which Seneca's Aminio's vox videtur & regia, cum sit pluriflua. Nihil enim per se quoniam Lib. 2. de quam deest. Refert quid, cui, quando, quare nbi, &c. Lib. 2. de quibus Plauti ratio non constabit; habetur personarum & dignitatum proprietas, & cum sit nobis virtutis modus, apud precet quod excedit, ex quo quod desinit; It seems a brace and Royal speech, where as it is very foolish. For nothing simply considered by it self befitts a man. We must regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like, without which considerations, no act can be approved. Let honours be proportioned unto the person: for whereas virtue is ever limited by measure, the excess is as faulty as the defect.

For his Person, it is very apparent, That he was as valiant as any man; a disposition, taken by it self, not much to be admired; For I am relolved, that he had ten thousand in his Army as daring as himself. Surely, if adventurous natures were to be commended simply, we should confound that virtue with the hardiness of Thieves, Kuffins, and Masked-men. For certainly it is no way praiseworthy, but in daring good things, and in the performance of thole lawful enterprises, in which we are employed for the service of our Kings, and Common weals.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other troubles of the World, who have bought their glory with so great destruction and effusion of blood, I think him far inferior to Cesar, and many other that lived after him, seeing he never undertook any warlike Nation, the naked Sythians excepted: nor was ever encountered with any Army of which he had not a most mauling advantage, both of Weapons and Commanders; every one of his Father's old Captains by far exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seems Fortune and Destiny

(if we may use those terms) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his own, both heaps of Men, that willingly offered their necks to the yoke, and Kingdoms that invited and called in their own Conquerors. For conclusion, we will agree with Seneca, who speaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Son, gives this Judgement of them: Quod non minores fieri potest mortalium, quam inundatio, quâ plenum omne perfusum est, quem confusio, quâ magna pars animalium exaruit: They were no less, plagues to mankind, than an overflow of Waters, drowning all the level; or some burning drought, whereby a great part of living Creatures are scorched up.

CHAP. III.

The Reign of Arideus.

SECT. I.

Of the Question about Succession to Alexander.

THe death of Alexander left his Army (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such safe, as was that monstrous Giant Polyphemus, having lost his only eye. For that which is reported in Fables of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance uneffectual, and harmful chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof (under the divine ordinance) were partly the uncertainty of Title to succession in the Kingdom of Macedon, partly the stubborn pride of Alexander himself, who thinking none worthy to be his heir, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leaving every one to his own fortune: but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals a lesson soon taught unto spirits reflecting upon their own worth, when the reverence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly been shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) governing in Macedon as Protector, assumed unto himself the Kingdom, nor rendering it unto Amintas, (the Son of his elder Brother Perdiccas) when he grew to man's estate; but only bestowing upon him in marriage a Daughter of his own: by which bond, and much more by his own proper strength, he assured the Crown unto himself. Amintas never attempting ought against Philip; though (with price of his life) he did against Alexander in the beginning of his Reign. Wherefore Eurydice the sole issue of this Marriage, ought in reason to have been acknowledged Queen after Alexander; as having better Title thereunto, than either He or Philip had, when they lived, unless (peradventure) some Law of that Nation forbade the Reign of Women. But the excellent virtue of these two Princes, had utterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, nor claiming from their own bodies; and so great were their Conquests, that Macedon it self was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix; and no way deserving to be laid in balance against the demand of their posterity, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royal Seat.

Alexander having taken many Wives, had issue by none of the principal of them. Barrise the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian, had born unto him a young Son: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more solemnly married) was left by him great with Child. But the balances of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleged in Bar of Heir made for them, by some that would (perhaps) have wrought out their own ends, under the name of Alexander's children.

Cleopatra, a Sister of Alexander, Widow to the King of Epirus, and Arideus his base Brother (Son to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lady Emyrdice before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may give suspicion, that either Law or Custom had made that Sex incapable of the Sovereignty: Arideus (besides his bastardy) was neither for person nor quality fit to rule as King; yet upon him the election fell, but slowly, and (as happeneth often) for lack of a better: when the Counsellors having over-laboured their disagreeing wits in devising what was best, were content for very weariness to take what comes next to hand.

Ptolomy (soon after King of Egypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the half-Persian brood, King Alexander's children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should be given to the Captains; that going for Law, which by the greater part of them should be decreed: so far was he from acknowledging any one as true Heir to the Crown.

This Ptolomy was called the Son of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who having used the company of Arine, Ptolomy's Mother, delivered her in marriage to Lagus, being great with child. Therefore, whether it were so, that he hoped well to work his own fortune out of those dissensions, which are incident unto the consultations of many ambitious men, equal in place, forcing them at length to redeem their quiet with subjection to one, deserving regard by his blood, and trust for his even carriage; or whether he only desired to get a share to himself, which could not have come to pass, had all been given to one: plain enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Arideus before himself: and therefore gave such counsel as fitted his own and other mens purposes. Yea, this device of his took place indeed, though not in form as he had propounded it: For, it was in effect all one, to have assembled at Alexander's empty Chair, as Ptolomy had conceived the form of their consultations, or to sit in the Chair such a King as Arideus, no wiser than the Chair it self. All the Controversies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captains; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

SECT. II.

The Election of Arideus, with the troubles thereabout arising; the first Division of the Empire.

But as these counterfeit shews of dissembling aspiciers do often take check by the plain dealing of them who dare to go more directly to work: so was it like to have failed with Ptolomy and the rest, when Arismus, another of the Captains, interpreted the very words of Alexander, saying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthyest, as designing Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) he delivered his Ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should be disposer of his own purchases: and those tokens of Alexander's purpose appeared plain enough, so long as no man would interpose another's construction: every one being uncertain how the secret affections of the rest might be enclosed. Many therefore, either out of their love, or because they would not be of the latest, urged Perdiccas to take upon him the Estate Royal. He was no stranger to the Royal blood; yet his birth gave him not such reputation, as the great favour of his dead King, with whom he had been very inward, and that especially since the death of Ephelbus (a powerful minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his own worth he might well be commended, as a good man of War, and one that had given much proof of his private valour. But very lately he was: which quality (joyned with good fortune) carried a shew of Majesty: being checkt with misadventure, it was called by a true name, Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the present business a foolish over-weening did him as great harm, as it had been great happiness to have succeeded Alexander. For, not content to have the acclamation of the Soldiers approving the sentence of Arismus, he would needs countermand, thinking that every one of the Princes would have intrusted him to take the weighty burden of an Empire, which would be the less envious, the more solemnity he used in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that feigneth himself a Sheep, may chance to be eaten by a Wolf. Melaeus, (a man by nature envious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas) took advantage of his irresolute behaviour, and very bitterly inveighed against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, That whosoever was Heir to the Crown, the Soldiers ought to be heirs to the Treasure; and therefore he invited them, who were nothing slow to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captains were left alone, far enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Soldiers, who greedy of spoil, thronged about Melaeus.

During this up-rear, mention was made of Arideus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, until at last it grew to the voice of the Army. Melaeus having withdrawn himself tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so fair an occasion to make himself great: therefore he produced Arideus, commended him to the Soldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, investing him in Alexander's Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vain: for they could not resolve what course to follow, rejecting this. Only Pythion, a hot-headed man, took upon him to proclaim the Son of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsel which Perdiccas at first had given, appointing Perdiccas and Leontius his Protectors. But the child was not yet born, which made that attempt of Pythion vain. Finally, Perdiccas with six hundred men, and Ptolomy with the King's Pages took upon them to defend the place where Alexander's body lay: but the Army, conducted by Melaeus, who carried the new King about whither he listed, easily brake in upon them, and enforced them to accept Arideus for their Sovereign Lord. Then by intercession of the ancient Captains, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leontius who was of Royal blood, a goodly Gentleman, and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which continued (for the most part) of the Nobility. Perdiccas abode in the City (but standing upon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any commotion that should happen among the Infantry. The King (who was governed by Melaeus) sent modestly, thinking that every one of the Princes would have intrusted him to take the weighty burden of an Empire, which would be the less envious, the more solemnity he used in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that feigneth himself a Sheep, may chance to be eaten by a Wolf. Melaeus, (a man by nature envious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas) took advantage of his irresolute behaviour, and very bitterly inveighed against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, That whosoever was Heir to the Crown, the Soldiers ought to be heirs to the Treasure; and therefore he invited them, who were nothing slow to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captains were left alone, far enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Soldiers, who greedy of spoil, thronged about Melaeus.

Perdiccas having now joyned himself with Leontius, kept the fields intending to cut off all provision of victuals from the City. But after sundry Embassies passing between the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to have the Authours of ledion given up into their hands; the King, that Meleager might be joyed with Leontas and Perdiccas, as a Third in the Government of the Army) things were compounded according to the King's desire. That such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to give him a principal place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treachery lurked under their great facility. General peace was renewed, and much love protected where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had been in Alexander's time: but no longer now did the same heart give it life; and windy spirits they were which moved in the Arteries. False reports were given out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his own disgrace, but in such terms as might seem to have proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, took it as an injury done to himself; and (as delicious of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such Authors of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a lover of peace) did well approve the motions and therefore agreed that a general Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receive their punishment (as was the manner for Soldiers offending) in presence of the Army. The plot was maliciously laid. Had Meleager given way to seditious rumours, he must needs have incurred the general hatred of all, as a fower of diffension, and thereby with a public approbation might have been cut off, as having often offended in that kind; his Prince being too weak a Patron. Now seeking redress of these disorders, he halsted his own ruin, by a less formal, but more speedy way. This kind of Muster was very solemn, and practised with many ceremonies, as for cleansing the Army. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries were each according to their quality set in array, apart from others, as if they had been of sundry sorts, met at adventure: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to the direction of their several Captains. But at that time the great battle of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose belowed in a ground of disadvantage; and the countenance of the Horse and Elephants beginning to give charge upon them was such, as discovered no jelling palliure, nor good intent. Kings were always wont to fight among the horse-men: of which custom Perdiccas made great use that day, to the utter confusion of his enemies. For Arvidus was always governed by him, who for the present had him in possession. Two or three days before he fought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas up and down about the footmen, commanding them to deliver unto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were call unto the Elephants and by them slain in the presence of the King (who should have defended them) and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when he disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especial friends. Having therefore kept himself quiet a while, as unwilling to give offence to them that had the advantage, when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they fent and flew him.

The Army being thus corrected, was led into the City, where a new Council of the Princes was held; who finding what manner of man their King was, divided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves: leaving to Arvidus the office of a Victor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the Forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought upon; whose body having been seven days neglected, was opened and embalmed by the Egyptians: no sign of poyson appearing, how greatsoever the suspicion might be. The charge of his burial was committed to Arvidus, one of the Captains, who was two years preparing of a great and costly hearse, making a flatly Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coffers of his friends being laid in the ground before that of Alexander was belowed in Alexandria, a City of his own building in Egypt.

SECT. III.

The beginning of the Lamiar War.

WHILE these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principal Noblemen, and inferior to none of Alexander's followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were banished in Greece with a War, which the Athenians more bravely than wisely had begun in Alexander's life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, upon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greeks (few excepted) should be recalled unto their former places. He knew the factious quality of the Grecian Estates, and therefore thought fit to provide, that in every City he would have a sure party. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he won by this proud injunction. His pleasure indeed was fulfilled; yet without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in estate, but retaining more than was needful of their ancient spirits, forbade the execution of this Decree in their Dominions; so did also the Asians who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by Nature: yet neither of them took Arms, but seemed to bear themselves as men that had done no more than they might well justify by reason: nevertheless to prevent the worst, the Athenians gave secret instructions to Leptines, a Captain of theirs, willing him to levy an Army, but in his own name, and to keep it in a readines for their use. This was no hard thing for Leptines to do: great numbers of Greek Soldiers being lately returned from the Asian War in poor estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captains. Of these he had gathered up eight thousand, when the certain news was brought of Alexander's death: at which the City of Athens declared it self, and more honourably than wisely, proclaimed War against the Macedonians for the liberty of Greece. Hereupon Leptines drew in the Asians, and some other Estates, gave battle to the Asians, who sided with Antipater, and overthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and and so strong in adherents, that Antipater (arming in all haste, yet suspecting his own strength) was fain to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vain than the fears and hopes of men, thunning or pursuing their desires afar off, which deceive all mortal wisdom, even when they seem near at hand. One month was scarcely past, since nothing so heavily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the return of Craterus into Macedonia; which he then feared as death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured unto him, was sent into Macedonia to convey the old Soldiers (that was the pretence) and to succour Antipater in the Government of Macedonia and Greece. The suspicions were strong that he had a privy charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better; which was, That Antipater should be sent unto the King, as Captain of the young Soldiers, newly to be levied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes give out speeches, testifying his own jealousy and hatred of him; but yet he strove to smother it, which in a cruel Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexander's Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeed were mean persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the King's rigour was such, as could find rebellious purposes (for so he interpreted even lawful Government) in base persons; little might Antipater hope for, who having sitten Viceroys ten years in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the envy of a Court, wherein they had been his inferiours, which would new repine to see him their equal. Therefore whether his fear drew him to prevention, working first the King's death by poyson, given by his Son Iolans, Alexander's Cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth until opportunity had changed it into the passion of revenge, which was cruelly performed by his Son Callander's great cause of much fear he had; which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in very few years.

At the present, Craterus was sent for, and all the Captains of Companies lying near, solicited to make haste. Not without cause: For in Macedonia there could not at that time be raised more than thirteen thousand foot, and six hundred horses, which Muster was of raw Soldiers, all the force of the Country being employed in Asia. The Thessalians indeed who had long stood firm for Philip and Alexander, who also were the best horse-men of Greece, furnished him with very brave troops, that might have done great service, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thessaly try the Fortune of a Battle with Leptines; rather (as may seem) fearing the increase of his enemies power, and rebellion of the Greeks, (were they not checkt at the first) than presuming on his strength. For Leptines had of Athenians, Asians, and Mercenaries, two and twenty thousand foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signiories, and of some Thyrians and Thracians: of horse he brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but over-strong he was that way also, when once the Thessalians had revolted unto him. So Antipater lost the day; and his loss was such, that he neither was able to keep the field, nor to make a safe retreat into his own Country; therefore he fled into the Town of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well provided of all things necessary to bear out a siege. Thither did Leptines follow him, prelent him battel again, and upon refusal close up the Town with Earth-works, and a Wall. There will we leave him for a while, travelling in the last honourable enterprise that ever was undertaken by that great City of Athens.

SECT. IV.

How Perdiccas employed his Army.

KING Arvidus living under the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his own Province, kept a naked Court: all his greatness consisting in a bare Title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make use of him. Perdiccas had no Province of his own peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he should visit in his Government. A stronger Army than any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope for that unsettled condition of things to make better worth to him than many Provinces could have been. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander, yet about the same time he either married Nices the daughter of blind their eyes, who did not somewhat narrowly search into his doings.

Arivantes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth King of that Country, had continued faithful to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his fore-fathers, even from Pharnaces, the first that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Atissa sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancestors had indeed been oppressed by the Persian: but what Fortune took from them at one time, Vertue restored at another, and their faithful Princes had much encreased all. But now in the late Period of so great an Empire, with much wisdom, and (Darius being slain) with sufficient honour, he might have acknowledged the Macedonian in the Persian room. This he did not: neither did Alexander call him him to account, being occupied with great cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater business wherein to entertain his Army, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take that inland Kingdom, surrounded with Provinces of the Macedonian Conquest, and for his own particular, to have one opportune place of sure retreat, under the Government of a stedfast friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Arivantes, who drew into the field 30000 foot, and 15000 horse (a strong Army, had it not encountered a stronger, and better trained) won the victory, and thereby the whole Kingdom. But with much cruelty did he use the victory: for having taken Arivantes prisoner, with many others, he crucified them, and as many of his Kindred as he could light upon, and so delivered that Province to Eumenes, whom of all men living he trusted most. Another part of his forces he had committed to Pythion, thon, rather as to the most honourable of such as remained about him, than as to the most affluant. Pythion was to fuddle the Greeks rebelling in the high Countries of Asia. About twenty thousand foot, and thirty thousand horse they were (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander to bridle the barbarous Nations, were from weary of their unpleasant habitations, and the rude people, among whom they lived: And therefore took advantage of the present troubles to seek unto themselves a better fortune. Against these Pythion went, more desirous to make them his own, than to destroy them; which intent of his Perdiccas discovering, did both give him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giving the spoils of them to his Souldiers, and further enjoyed it upon Pythion's Captains (his own creatures) that they should see his commandment executed. These directions for use of the victory, might have proved needless; so uncertain was the victory itself. A Captain of the Rebels commanding over three thousand, corrupted by Pythion, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtful) retire without necessity to a hill not far off. This dismayed the rest, and gave the day to Pythion: who being far enough from Perdiccas offered composition to the vanquished, granting unto them their lives and liberty, under condition of laying down their arms; and hereupon he gave them his faith. Being Master of these Companies, he might well have a good opinion of his own power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himself as free Lord of any Territory. He had thirteen thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companies, whom needless fear without great loss had caused to leave the field: but in true estimation, all the greatness whereof Pythion might think himself assured, was (and soon appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Pythion, levied; the Rulers of the Provinces carefully obeying the Letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enjoined to give assistance to that business; and by virtue of the precept given unto him, Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all those poor men who had yielded themselves; leaving Pythion as naked as he came forth to return unto his great Master.

Now was Perdiccas mighty above the mighty, and had fair leisure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himself Lord of all: but this must be secretly carried for fear of opposition. How it succeeded, will appear when the Lamian War taketh ending.

SECT. V.

The Process of the Lamian War.

WE left Antipater hardly besieged, wanting means to free himself without succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so soon as he expected, he came to parley with Leotibenes, and would have yielded unto any terms of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of Victory, do seldom limit their desires. Leotibenes would him without further circumstance to submit himself to discretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded over them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremity, from which as yet he was far enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Town, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingering War the Thracians (whether weary of sitting still at a siege, or having business which they pretended at home) took their leave, and returned into their own Country. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found means to fallly upon their enemies to their great loss: for many were slain, and Leotibenes himself among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Town. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved, their victuals waited, and they were not strong enough to deal with the Greeks in open fight. Craterus was long in coming. Lysimachus, who was nearest at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his own, leading no more than four thousand foot, and two thousand horse, against Senthas the Thracian King, who brought into the field above four times that numbers and though Lysimachus, not without loss, had gotten one victory, yet the enemy abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leontas was earnestly solicited by Antipater's friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the Government of Thyrgia the lefts, and was able to raise an Army of more than twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; whether levied out of his own Province, or appointed unto him out of the main Army, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the journey into Greece, than Antipater was to have him come. For Cleopatra had written unto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chief City of Macedon, and very kindly offering her self to be his Wife; which letters he kept not so close as had been requisite, and therefore brought himself into great suspicion, that soon ended with his life. Antipater, chosen General by the Athenians in place of Leotibenes, hearing of his approach, forsook the siege of Lamia, and took the ready way to these great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to give them an evil welcome home, before Antipater and they should join in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Thracians) the advantage of Leontas in horse, by the odds of two thousand Thessalians; in other things he was equal with him, in case he thought himself Superior, in the fortune of that day he proved so: for he won a great victory (chiefly by virtue of the Thessalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leontas himself; who fighting valiantly, was driven into a marshy piece of ground, where he found his death, which he desperately had fought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his nativity. He was the first of Alexander's Captains which died in battle; but all, or most of the rest shall follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did never any thing fuitable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weak to renew the fight, and too proud to flee. They betook themselves to high grounds for refuge on horseback, and so abode in the sight of the enemy that day; the day following, Antipater with his men came into their Camp, and took the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their strength to be at the

the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seek to determine the matter quickly by another battle. But still Antipater kept himself on ground of advantage; which gave more than reasonable confidence to the Greeks, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquished. This wretchedness incorrigible in an Army of Volunteers) was very excusable; seeing that the victories by Land were very much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians, labouring to have made themselves once again Masters, were put to the work.

But now the fatal captivity of Greece came on, of which the never could be delivered unto this day. Craterus with a strong Army having made great marches from Cilicia, passed over into Europe, and coming into Thessaly, joined himself with Antipater. The forces of Leontas, Antipater and Craterus being joined in one, contained forty thousand weightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and five thousand horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse; in foot, eighteen thousand. Carefully therefore did Antipater labour to avoid the necessity of a battle, until such time as the Towns confederate should return unto the Camp those bands which straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in coming, and Antipater so urgent upon the Greeks, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more help they had carried away the victory: for the Thessalians had the upper hand, and held it, until such time as they perceived their battels (over-laid with multitude) retire unto the higher ground, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, having little else to boast of, considering that with the loss of an hundred and thirty men, they had only purchased the death of some five hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great use made: For the Greeks, as not subject unto the full command of one General, and being every one desirous to preserve his own Estate and City: concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a subtle Artificer, and well understanding their aptness to division, refused to hearken to any general composition, but willed every City to deal apart for itself. The intent of his device was so apparent, that it was rejected: the Greeks chusing rather to abide the coming of their assailants, whose unreasonable carelessness betrayed the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging and winning some Towns in Thessaly, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieve, wearied that Nation from attending any longer upon other mens unlikely hopes, with their own assured and present calamity.

SECT. VI.

Of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. Of Demosthenes his death.

THE Thessalians falling off, all the rest soon followed severally, and sued for peace: the gentle conditions given to the most forward, including such as were slack. Only the Athenians and Illyrians held out. Little favour could they hope for, having been Authors of this tumult, and their fear was not great; the fear of the war being far from them. But the celerity of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who fate still at Athens, deviling upon courses of procuring the War to come, which came to their doors before their consultation could find issue. He was ready to enter upon their Frontiers; they had no ability to resist, and were as heartless as friendsless. All that remained was to send Ambassadors, desiring peace upon some good terms: necessity enforcing them to have accepted even the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chief of this Embassy: Phocion, as the most honourable; Demades as a strong persuader (both of them well respected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdom, gravity of manners and virtues; but all these ornaments confining in speculation and therefore of less regard, when their admiration was to cost them much in real effects.

Antipater calling to mind the pride of Leotibenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the War past, to pay a fine, and entertain a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the Government of the City to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a convenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was given; a number great enough to retain the name and form of a Democracy. But the rascal multitude of beggarly persons, accustomed to get their livings out of the common troubles, being now debarr'd from bearing offices and giving their voices, cried out, that this was a meer Oligarchy, the violent usurpation of a few encroaching upon the publick right. These turbulent fellows (of whom King Philip had been wont to say, That war to them was peace, and peace war) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gave them Lands to manure; leaving as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withal for satisfying his own suspicions and hatred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others, to be slain. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, been forborn, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well have passed for very mild; whereas now, all such as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or have surrendered their judgements to Authors justly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that ever did speak and write, condemn him utterly, calling him a bloody Tyrant. Such grace and reputation do the Learned Arts find in all Civil Nations, that the evil done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blench any action, how good soever otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (cleave with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) find him, and gently perswaded him to leave the place; but not so prevailing, he threatened violence. Then Demosthenes intreating a little respite, as it had been to write somewhat, secretly secretly took poison, which he had kept for such a necessity, and to die's rather chusing to do the last execution upon himself, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable perhaps in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battle, howsoever valiant in persuading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. He loved money well, and had great sums given him by the Perfians, to encourage him, in hiding work for the Macedonians at home. Neither did he ill (we think) in taking from the Perfians which loved not his Country, great rewards, for speaking such things as tended to his Country's good; which he did not cease to procure, when the Perfians were no longer able to give him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can endure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) believe Lucius, who tells us, That it was Antipater's purpose to have done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a stedfast enemy to the Macedonians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chief command was left in the hands of Phoenix, a virtuous man, lover of his Country, yet applying himself to the necessity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the City much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grievous to free men, yet favourable to the vanquished, he endeavoured carefully to preserve.

SECT. VII.

How Craterus and Antipater were drawn from their Ætolian wars into Asia. The ground of the first civil war between the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthened their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Thiba, the Daughter of Antipater to Wife.

Shortly after they went against the Ætoliars, whose poverty was not so easily daunted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerful State of Athens had been. Their Country was rough and mountainous, having many places of great fastness, into which they conveyed such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for War; with the rest they fortified the frontiers of their Cities, and so abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully resisted. With great obstinacy did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the place, which the Ætoliars made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut up all passages, and utterly debarr'd them of relief, then were they put to a miserable choice; either to defend from their strong holds, and fight upon equal ground, with unequal numbers, or to endure the miseries of hunger and cold, against which they could make no long resistance; or to yield themselves to the Macedonians, who, incensed by the loss of many good Soldiers, were not like to leave so stubborn enemies in places which might give confidence to Rebellion. In case of extremity much fineness of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger, commonly doth more hurt than a blunt consideration of that only which at the present is in hand. These Ætoliars did not as yet wait meat; but their enemies daily molested them; wherefore as they thought upon nothing but fighting, Fortune was gracious to their courage. For such news came out of Asia into the Macedonian Camp as made Antipater and Craterus think every hour a month, till they had rid their hands of these Ætoliars, giving them whatsoever conditions they would ask: yet with purpose to call them to a severe account; yea, to root them out of Greece by death or by captivity, when once they should have fettled the affairs of Asia; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is diffuser; in whole high Council it was ordained, that that poor Nation should continue a troublesome bar to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchy) an open gate to let the Romans (conquerors into those and other Provinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so far from taking effect, that it served merely as an introduction to all the civil Wars ensuing.

The grounds of the Asiatick Expedition, which did for the world in an uproar, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexander's Captains the mightiest in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient prebendancy, and the present rule which he bore in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the best beloved, and most respected, both of Alexander, and of the whole Army. Next unto these had Perdiccas been; whom the advantage of his presence at the King's death did make equal, or superior, to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiccas were, to have comforted with these two, and to have been with them a third partner in the Government of all; to which purpose he entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipater's Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that gale of wind which bore him up, he began to take wing and soar quite another way. Aridus was a very simple man, yet served well enough to wear the title of that Majesty, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become Proprietary, the practice was more severe than had been in the days of Alexander: the desire to seem terrible, being very familiar with great Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who had all other means of preserving themselves from contempt, and of giving such a fiery lustre to their Actions, as may dazzle the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poor Greeks in the higher Asia were all put to the sword; and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath already been shewed. The Pisidians were the next who felt the wrath of the counterfeits Alexanders. One City of theirs was utterly razed; the children sold for slaves, and all the rest massacred. The Isaurians, by this example grown desperate, when after two or three days trial they found themselves unable to continue the defence, lockt themselves into their houses, and fet the Town on fire, into the flame whereof the young men did throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the walls.

These exploits being performed, the Army had no other work than to sift the ashes of the burnt City for gold and silver; but Perdiccas had

Perdiccas his voyage into Egypt, and his death.

Perdiccas, uncertain which way to bend his main power, at length resolved to set upon Phlomy; leaving Eumenes to keep to his use, against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Asia bordering upon Europe.

It may seem strange, that he did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Phlomy could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Phlomy; or believed that Craterus would not be ready for him soon enough. Sure it is, that he took a bad course and made it worse with ill handling.

Phlomy by his sweet behaviour allured many to his party, without help of any bad arts. Perdiccas contrariwise was full of infidelity, which never fails to be rewarded with hatred, which is truly defined, An affection founded upon opinion of an unjust contempt. The whole story of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relation: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a willful man) tired his followers, and waited them in hard enterprises without success. His most forcible attempt was upon a Town, called the Camels Wall; thither he marched by night, with more haste than good speed; for Phlomy preventing him, did put himself into the place, where behaving himself not only as a good Commander, but as a stout Soldier, he gave the foil to Perdiccas, causing him to retire with loss, after a vehement, but vain assault, continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another journey (which was his last) and came to the divisions of Nilus, over against Memphis. There with much difficulty he began to pass over his Army into an Island, where he meant to encamp. The current was strong, the water deep, and hardly fordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants above the passage, to break the violence of the stream, and his horsemen beneath it, to take up such as were carried away by swiftnels of water. A great part of his Army being arrived on the further bank, the channel began to wax deep; so that whereas the former companies had waded up to the chin, they who should have followed could find no footing. Whether this came by the rising of the water, or by fitting away of the ground (the earth being broken with the feet of so many Men, Horse and Elephants) no remedy there was, but such as had passed must repass again, as well as they might for they were too weak for the enemy, and could not be relieved by their fellows. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the River, wherein above two thousand of them perished, a thousand were devoured by Crocodiles, a miserable spectacle even to such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swim, recovered the Camp; many were carried down the stream, and driven to the contrary bank, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Soldiers against their General, giving liberty to their tongues, which long time had concealed the evil thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, news came from Phlomy, which did set them in an up roar. Ptolomy had not only shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands alive, but performed all rights of Funeral to the dead carcases, which the River had cast upon his side: and finally, sent their bones and ashes to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not only move the common Soldiers, but made the Captains fall into mutiny, thinking it unreasonable to make war upon virtuous and honourable a person, to fulfil the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, using them like slaves. The sedition growing strong, wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Pythou was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the disgrace which he had suffered by his procurement, after the Victory upon the rebellious Greeks. Pythou had lived in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the division of the Provinces made Governour of Media; he had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equal to him, had nevertheless been scornfully used by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captains, and a good part of the Horse, which consisted of the Gentry (the footmen having declared themselves before) he entered the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumstance they all ran upon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud misgoverning authority of Perdiccas. He might have lived as great as himself; yea, peradventure Master of all, had he not been too masterly over those which were already his.

The next day Ptolomy came into the Camp, where he was joyfully received; he excused himself of things past, as not having been Author, or given cause of the War, and was easily believed: the favour of the Army being such toward him, that needs they would have made him Protector in the room of Perdiccas. But this he refused. It was an Office fit for one that would seek to increase his greatness with his trouble. Ptolomy was well enough already, wherefore, for his own quiet he forbore to accept it, and for their well-deserving of him, he procured that honourable charge to Pythou, and to Ariseus the Captain, who having had some Companies of Soldiers, to furnish with their attendance the solemnities of Alexander's Funerals, did with them adhere to him against Perdiccas.

In the midst of these businesses came news of two great Victories obtained by Eumenes; which news, had they arrived two or three days sooner, had been entertained with joyful acclamations; and would have given such reputation to Perdiccas, as had caused both his private maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to have accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings coming in ill time, when death had stopped the ears which would have given them welcome, found bad acceptance, as shall be shewed hereafter.

SECT. IX.

Victories of Eumenes in the lower Asia.

Before we proceed in the relation of things happening about the person of the King, it is meet that we speak of those businesses in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexterity, whilst Perdiccas was occupied in the Egyptian Wars. Alcetas the Brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had received command from Perdiccas to be assistant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat answer that he would not; alleging the backwardness of his men to bear Arms against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make fair shew, but inwardly he repined at the precedence given to Eumenes, as thinking himself the better man. Eumenes discovering, through the counterfeited looks of Neoptolemus, the mischief lurking in his heart, wisely dissembled with him, in hope to win him by gentle behaviour, and sweet language, that commonly are lost, when belied upon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortify himself, that he might stand upon his own strength, he sailed out of the Countries under his jurisdiction, about six thousand Horse, giving many privileges to such as were fervent; and training them well up. Not without great need. For when upon advertisement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellespont) for the invasion of his Provinces, he wished Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power; Neoptolemus did (indeed) advance, but in hostile manner, though unprovoked, presented him Battle. Neoptolemus had secretly covenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the Conquest of Asia, which now intending to perform, he was shamefully disappointed. For, though his foot-men, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and prevailed far upon Eumenes his Battels; yet were his horse driven out of the field, and himself compelled, with a few of them, to run away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men to be charged by Eumenes, who forced them in such wise, that casting down their Pikes, they cried for mercy, and gladly took their oath to do him faithful service. Antipater and Craterus endeavoured with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their society, who contrariwise offered himself as a mean of reconciliation, between Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearly loved; professing withal his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which he had undertaken to maintain.

Whilst these negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crew to Antipater, and his Associates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a Scribe (at which toothill railing they laughed) but extolling the virtue of Craterus (as well he might) with high commendations; assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appear, or that his voice were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Camp, the Victory was won; for they would all forthwith revolt unto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to give him aid against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might have the leading of the Army to be sent. Their own affections did easily lead them to condescend to his motion: good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prevail as much as the force which he drew along. For he had in the midst of Alexander's vanities, when others (imitating their King) had took them selves to the Persian fashions of garments and customs, retained the ancient Macedonian form of behaviour, and apparel; whereby he became very gracious with the common Soldiers, who beheld these new tricks of Asia with disaffected eyes, as reproachful and derogatory to the manners of their native Country. So Antipater took the way toward Gallia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to join with Ptolomy. Craterus used great solicitude, to have taken Eumenes revelling (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Captains, after a great Victory. But he had a wary and well advised enemy to encounter, who kept good espial upon him, and with much wisdom fore-saw all that was to be feared, and the means of prevention, which his courage did not fail to execute. Eumenes was not ignorant that Craterus was able to defeat him without Battle, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Army following him: yet the Army following him were such as much exceeded his own foot-men, but was inferior in horse-men, and thought it more unsafe to keep the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a strange piece of work, which disoperation of all courses else taught him, and wise managing prosperously accomplished. He gave out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with such company as he could gather together, and had gotten Pizres (a Captain of no great estimation, who lay not far off) to join with him. Having animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be despised and hated among them, (as having been vanquished by some of them, and forsaken others in plain field, whilst they valiantly fought in his quarrel) he took great care to keep them from receiving any intelligence of the enemies matters. Premptorily he commanded that no messenger nor trumpet should be admitted, and not herewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would have regarded him, had he been known: but Thracians, Cappadocians and Persians, under the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas and himself. To these also he gave in charge, that without speaking or hearkening to any word, they should run upon the enemy, and give him no leisure to lay, or do any thing but fight. The directions which he gave to others, he did not fail to execute in his own person; but placing himself in the right wing of his Battle, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as he understood) conducted the left wing on the contrary side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and ready to charge the enemy as soon as the distance would give leave. A rising piece of ground lay between them, which having ascended, the Armies discovered each other: but that of Eumenes every way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long journeys, which overhastily they had made, seeking the deceitful issue of frivolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (having failed in surprising them as enemies) to discover himself to his old friends, and fellow-souldiers, of whom he could see none. Phenix a Tendian, and Artabazus a Persian, had the leading of that side, who, mindful of their instructions, began to give battle upon him, with such countenance as told him his error; which to re-dem, he had his men fight, and redeem the day, and take the spoil to themselves; but the Bear, whose skin he kills, is not yet caught. The ground whereon the Battle was fought, gave most advantage to the horse, who encountered very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus, who, as soon as they had discovered one another, could not contain themselves, but with great rage met body to body, and letting loose their bridles, grappled so violently together, that their horses ran from under them, leaving both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first up; but Eumenes had his sword first drawn, where-with he boughed the other, causing him to fall down and fight upon the knee. In this conflict they received many wounds; but Neoptolemus giving flight ones, took such as were deadly, by which he died in the place, and there was being half-dead, half-alive) stripped by his mortal enemy, whose revivings he requested, lying even at the last gasp, with one wound in the groin, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to run away upon the spur, and seek shelter behind the Battels of their foot. They were nothing butly pursued. For Eumenes paired himself to carry succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed; but found accompanied with the same fortune, that had assisted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly born himself a while, and sustained the impetuous of Arabians and Phenians with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little estimation or note. Otherwise it is not unlikely that he might have either carried the day, or preferred himself to a better adventure by giving ground, as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were slain) did. But whilst he fought to preserve his reputation, he lost his life by the fall of his Horse, or his falling from his Horse, through force of a wound received, upon which accident he was trampled under foot by many that knew him not, and so perished unknown, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes coming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as having always loved and honoured Craterus, of whose death he was now become the instrument. The vanquished Army entertained a treaty of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willingness to become his followers; but their intent was only to refresh themselves, which (by his permission) having done, they stole away by night, and fled towards Antipater.

This Battle fought within ten days of the former, won to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his own Soldiers took the death of Craterus heavily; and the Armies lying further off were enraged with the news. But other matters there were which incensed men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifestly appeared, that he was as fussy as any pretended greater heaviness. His Army wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wisely amended, by giving to them the spoil of such Towns as were ill affected to him. So he redeemed the love of his own men, who of their meek motion appointed unto him a Guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easy to be reconciled. They who had been Traitors to Perdiccas, hated him for his faithfulness, as greatly, as they thought he would hate them for their faithfulness; neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late revolt, than by accusing and condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and condemned him to dye: but it was an easier matter to give that sentence, than to put it in execution.

SECT. X.

Quarrels between Eurydice the Queen, and Python the Protector. Python resigns his Office, into which Antipater is chosen.

Python and Ardeus being chosen Protectors of King Arideus, and the children of Alexander, took the way to Asia the less, conducting the Army thither Syria. Of these two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet far too weak to sustain so important a Charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Arideus, was come to her husband, a Lady of a masculine spirit, well understanding what she was or should be, and thinking her self able to support the weight which fortune laid upon her feeble husband, being due to her own title. Her mother Cyna, Sister to Alexander, by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath been shewed) to Antipater, who was the right Heir to the Kingdom of Macedon, being the only Son of King Perdiccas, Philip's elder Brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman; she had led Armies, and (as a true Sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Ceria, Queen of the Phrygians, a Virago, like unto her self, had slain her. She brought up this Eurydice in the same womanly Art of War, who now among the Souldiers began to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the final contentment of Python, that could not brook her too curious intermeddling in his charge. Whether it were so, that Python had some purpose to advance the Son of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdom, (as once he had fought to do) or whether the Queen did suspect him of some such intent; or whether only desire of rule caused her to quarrel with him; quarrel she did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Army having taken off such a rank-ride as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reign'd with a twined throng. Python bearing himself upon his Office took upon him to give directions in the King's name, which the Queen did oftentimes control, using the same name with more authority, and better liking of the Souldiers. Python feeling this, would needs resign his office, whether upon weariness of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queen into envy, is uncertain. Perhaps he thought, that now being the far worthiest man in the Camp, he should be intrusted to retain the place, and have his Authority confirmed, or (as might be) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successor. Eurydice was nothing sorry at this course; for now he thought to manage the affairs of the Empire at her own will, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python of their contrary expectations; choosing Antipater, the only powerful man of Alexander's Captains, then living, into the room of Python. Hereat the Queen fretted exceedingly, and began to deal earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord, save only the King their Sovereign. Yet the failed of her purpose, being hindered (as may seem) by three things: the apparent weakness of her husband; the growth of Alexander's children, who (though born of our-landish women) were bred in the Macedonian Camp; and the mightiness of Antipater, who commanding a great Army near at hand, arrived in few days at the Camp, and enforced Eurydice to hold her self content, Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to work by any close devices as Perdiccas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Governors of Provinces that remained alive, acknowledged him their better; yea many of them he displaced out of hand, putting other in their rooms. This done, he took the King, Queen and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonus General of the Royal Army: to whom for his good services done, and to be done again, Eumenes, he gave the rule of Asiana, besides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the Government of Asia during that War.

SECT. XI.

Antigonus Lieutenant of Asia, wins a Battle of Eumenes, and besieges him in Nora: He vanquisheth other followers of Perdiccas.

Here begins the greatness of Antigonus, whose power in few years over-growing the rest, wanted little of spreading it self over the whole Morichy. He was to make War upon Eumenes, Alcetes the Brother, and Attalus the Brother-in-law to Perdiccas: work enough to keep his Army employed in the publick service, till such time as he might find occasion to make use of it in his own business. The first of these which he undertook, was Eumenes, with whom Alcetes and Attalus refused to join, having unreasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chief place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needful provisions; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all ways of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Army with Letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if he himself had scattered abroad those Letters to try the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captains as he thought most likely to be won. Of these Captains one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any help was near him, yet looking so carefully to himself, that he and his were surprized, when he thought his enemies far off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be company with Antigonus) kept his treachery secret, referring it for the time of execution. Upon consideration of the reason which this false man Apollonides had undertaken, Antigonus presented battle to Eumenes; in the best wise of Apollonides, General of the Hosts to Eumenes, fled over to the contrary side, with such as he could get to follow him, but was closely followed by some whose company he desired not. Eumenes perceiving the irrecoverable mischief which this traitorous practice had brought upon him, pursued the villain, and cut him off before he could thrust himself into the Troops of Antigonus, and boast of his treachery. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the loss of his Battle, which disabled him utterly to keep the field, and left it, very hard for him to make a safe retreat. Yet

one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himself to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the Victory, to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilst Antigonus held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compass, returned to the place where the Battle had been fought; there he buried (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and ashes of the Captains and common Souldiers apart, raising up heaps of earth as mountains over them, and to went his way. As this bold adventure bred in the Macedonians (returned to their Camp) great admiration of his brave spirit: so the news which Menesander (who was set to look unto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to love him as their honourable friend. He had found Menesander in an open Plain, careless, as after an assured Victory, and laden with the spoils of many Nations, the rewards of their long service; all which he might have taken: but tearing left such a purchase should prove a heavy burthen to him, whose chief hope consisted in swift expedition, he gave secret warning to Menesander to flee to the Mountains, whilst he detained his men (whom authority could not have restrained) by this flight, setting them to bait their horses. This Menesander extolled him for this courtship, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborn when it lay in his power to strip them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaves, and to ravish their wives: but Antigonus told them, that he had not been born to do this out of any good will to them; but of mere civility had avoided those precious Fetters, which would have hindered his speedy flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not only think all carriages to be over-burthenome, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than available in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to shift for themselves, and retaining only five hundred horse, and two hundred foot. When he had wearied Antigonus a while in following him up and down, he came to Nora, where again keeping about him no more than necessity required to make good the place, he lovingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little Fortrefs in Lycania and Cappadocia, so strongly situated, that it seemed impregnable, and so well victualled and stored with all necessities, that it might hold out for many years. Thither did Antigonus follow him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in War. To this purpose he entertained parley with him, but in vain. For whereas Antigonus offered him pardon and his love, Eumenes required restitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipater's consent. Then was Nora closed up; where Antigonus leaving sufficient strength for continuance of the Siege, took his Journey into Pisidia against Alcetes and Attalus, with whom he made short work. He came upon them unexpected, and seized on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captain as Eumenes, to have defended them. Alcetes and Attalus, as they had been too secure before his coming, so were they too adventurous in fighting at the first fight upon all disadvantages, and their folly was attended with fatal event. Attalus with many principal Captains was taken; Alcetes fled to the City of Troas, where the love of the younger fort toward him was so vehement, that stopping their ears against all persuasions of the ancient men, they needs would hazard their lives, and their Country in his defence. Yet this availed him nothing: for the Governors of the Town having secretly compounded with Antigonus, caused the young men to fall out; and using the time of advantage, they with their servants did set upon Alcetes, who unable to resist, flew himself. His dead body was conveyed to Antigonus, and by him barbarously torn, was cast forth without burial. When Antigonus was gone, the young men interred the Carcasses with solemn Funerals, having once been minded to let on Fire their Town in revenge of his death. Such favour had he purchased with courteous liberality. But, to make an able General, one virtue, how great soever is insufficient.

SECT. XII.

Protolmy wins Syria and Phoenicia. The death of Antipater.

Whilst these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enjoy their Governments in the present, than to contrive or enlarge them. Only Protolmy looking abroad, saw all Syria and Phoenicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumstance in the managing. He sent a Lieutenant with an Army, who quickly took Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may seem) without any great strength of Souldiers, far from Alliances, and vainly relying upon the Authority which had given him that Province, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintain him in his office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. He had with him Polyperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexander's Captains, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrel of Perdiccas, prevailing at first, but soon losing all that they had gained, whilst Antipater was abroad in his Cilician Expedition. In this Polyperchon, Antipater did repose great confidence; so far forth, that (suspecting the youth of his own Son Cassander of insufficiency in so great a charge) he bequeathed unto him on his death-bed the Government of Macedon and Greece, together with the office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being fourscore years old, having always travelled in the great affairs of mighty Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatness was jealous of him, and the Successors of Alexander did either quietly give place unto him, or were unfortunate in making oppositions. In his private qualities, he was a subtle man, temperate, frugal, and of a Philosophical behaviour, not unlearned, as having been Scholar to Aristotle, and written some Histories. He had been much mollified by Olympias, Alexander's Mother; whom after the death of her Son, he compelled to abstain from coming into Macedonia, or intermeddling in matters of State; yea at his own death he gave especial direction, that no woman should be permitted to deal in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soon forgotten; and yet, ere long, by sorrowful experience approved to have been sound and good.

SECT.

SECT. XIII.

Of Polyperchon, who succeeded unto Antipater in the Protectorship, the insurrection of Cassander against him.

Polyperchon was very skilful in the Art of War, having long time been Apprentice in that occupation; other qualities, requisite in to high an Office as he undertook, either Nature had not given to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his business more formally than wisely, as of a second wit, sifter to assist, than commander in chief. At the first entrance upon the Stage, he called to council all his friends, wherein for weighty considerations (as they who weighed not the contrary reasons held them) the Queen Olympias was revoked out of Epirus into Macedonia, that the presence of Alexander's Mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For the condition of the times requiring, that the Governors of Provinces abroad should keep greater Armies, than were needful or safe to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all Majesty, that might give authority to the Injunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awful regard contain within the limited bounds of duty such as could not by force have been kept in order, being strong and lying too far off.

Such care was taken for prevention of imaginary dangers and out of fight, whilst present difficulties lay unregarded in their bosoms. Cassander, the Son of Antipater, was not able to discover that great sufficiency in Polyperchon, for which his Father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could he discern such odds in the quality of himself and Polyperchon, as was in their fortune. He was left Captain of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the Title now seems to imply. He should thereby have been as Camp-master, or Lieutenant-General to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himself the better man. Therefore he began to examine his own power, and compare it with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relied on his Father was by his own assured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principal Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principal authority, in those Commonwealths, whose forms had been corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and draw in many partakers: it concerned these men in their own particular to adhere unto the Captains, by whom their faction was up-held; and by whom the rascally multitude, covetous of re-gaining the Tyrannous power, which they had formerly exercised over the principal Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Besides all these helps, Cassander had the secret love of Queen Olympias, who had in private rendered him such courtesy, as was due only to her Husband. But neither the Queens favour, nor all his other possibilities, gave him confidence to break out into open rebellion; because he saw Polyperchon much revered among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppress him, before he could have made head. Therefore he made show of following his pleasures in the Country, and calling many of his friends about him, under pretence of hunting, advised with them upon the safest course, and met free from all suspicion. The necessity was apparent of raising an Army, before the business was set on foot; and to do this, opportunity presented him with fair means. Ptolomy had by line force, without any commotion, annexed Syria to his Government of Egypt and Greece: this was too much either for the King, to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus upon the first news of Antipater's death, began to lay hold upon all that he could get, in such sort, that he manifestly discovered his intent of making himself Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in need of a Civil War, which Cassander well noted, and presumed withal, That the friendship which had passed between his Father and them, would avail him somewhat. Whereupon he secretly dispatched messengers to them both; and within a little while conveyed himself on a sudden over the Hellepont, that he might in much advance the business with greater speed. Much persuasion is needless in winning a man to what he desires. Antigonus coveting nothing more, than to find Polyperchon weak, by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly press him, by the memory of his Father, and all requisite conjurations, to abstain him in this enterprise; telling him, that Ptolomy was ready to declare for them, and urging him to a speedy dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repayed him with the same coin, saying, That for his own sake, and for his dead Father's, whom he had very dearly loved, he would not fail to give him all manner of succour. Having thus teased one another with words, they were nothing slack in preparing the common means, leading to their several ends.

SECT. XIV.

The unworthy courses held by Polyperchon, for the keeping down of Cassander.

Great necessity there was of timely provision. For Polyperchon needed no other instructions to inform him of Cassander's drift, than the news of his departure. He was not ignorant of the ready disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomy, to the strengthening of Rebellion; and well he knew that one principal hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Grecian Estate. Therefore (loving to work circumflectly) he called another Council, wherein it was concluded, That the popular form of Government should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawn; and that all Magistrates and principal Men, into whose hands Antipater had committed the supreme Authority, should forthwith be either slain or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassander's friends, and to raise up many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an unthankful nature in Polyperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For, how could he be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the Son went against to dishonour the Father's actions, whose only bounty had enabled him to do it? Or what could be said in their defence, who sought to destroy many worthy men, friends to the State, by whom the Greeks were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians; and in opposition to their private enemy, gave the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in Man's Body, through sickness newly issuing from one branch, a finger is vexed more by inflammation of his next Neighbour, than by any distemper in the contrary hand: so in bodies politic, the humours of men, subdivided in faction, are more enraged by the disagreeable qualities of such as curb them in their nearest purposes, than they are exasperated by the general opposition of such as are divided from them in the main trunk. Hereby it comes to pass, that contrary Religious are invited to help against Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawn in, to a part in civil wars, and ancient hatred called to counsel against injurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guilty; she hath taught the arm to set it self unto manifold loss in defence of the head: They are depraved affections, which render men sensible of their own particular, and forgetful of the more general good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greeks were presented with a vain show of liberty, ran under the King's name: but so, as one might easily discern, that Polyperchon had guided his pen. For the main point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polyperchon gave, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deal of kindness as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subjection, might well appear to have come other root than the pretended good will, and was of it self too base and unfit for a King to use toward his conquered Subjects, and often subdued Rebels.

SECT. XV.

Of the great Commotions raised in Athens by Polyperchon's decree. The death of Phocion.

Nevertheless the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, and fought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captain of the Garrison, which kept one of their Havens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Town, would needs take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hasty desires.

Nicanor, as a truly follower of Cassander, was by him thrust into the place, and Meniskus (that was Captain there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His coming to Athens was no way grateful to the Citizens, who soon after hearing the news of Antipater's death, cried out upon Phocion, saying, That he had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might, by advertising them in due time, have put into their hands a fair opportunity of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Far more grievously would they have been offended, had they known the intractions which Cassander had given to Nicanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not only retain Munychia, any injunction to the contrary notwithstanding; but that he should find means to thrust some companies into Piræus, and fortify that also, which was the principal Haven, against the High Town. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good ability: But the Athenians were not long in giving him sufficient cause to do that, which he would have done without any cause given. They desired him to come unto their Council, assembled in the Piræus, there to consider of the King's Proclamation: whether upon Phocion's word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the War, which was ready to break forth. Contrariwise, they urged him first of all, to make them masters of their own, which how to use, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend unto the other's demand; the Athenians (who did always measure Justice by profit, yet seldom thrived by that course) practised with Demetrius, a Captain following Polyperchon, and then lying near at hand, that he should enter into the Town, and take Nicanor Prisoner. But Phocion, who then governed Athens, a man very unlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politick dishonesty did quietly suffer him to depart and save himself.

Nicanor hereupon began to devise upon taking Piræus; not as following now the project of Cassander, but procuring his own just revenge. He levied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia: which done, he issued into Piræus, took it, and intrenched himself therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Haven, saw him now master of both. Alexander, the Son of Polyperchon, came thither shortly after with an Army. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recovering all, and addressed themselves unto him; who made fair shews, intending meer mischief, which they perceived not, being blinded with the vain Epitiles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queen. Olympias taking upon her to command, before the dust well adventure to return into Macedon, had preposterously charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which he held: but he would first consider more of the matter. Polyperchon had further ordained, that the Isle of Samos should be rendered unto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeed) so far from purposing to let them have Samos, that as yet he did not thoroughly intend to let them have themselves. The commodity of their Havens was then, as he would rather get into his own hands, than leave in theirs; yet rather withheld in theirs, than in Cassander's. His Son Alexander, notwithstanding that he made fair show to the Athenians, and spent much labour in commending with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labour, to intermeddle with the business. Hereupon the Citizens grew jealous, and the displeasure they conceived against him, they poured out upon Phocion, depriving him of his office. This was done with much tumult; banished Men and strangers thrusting themselves into the assembly of the Citizens, who distracted with sundry passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought every one that best could invent against things past, a most likely man to find some remedy for the evil threatening them. In this hurly-burly was Alexander devising how he might come to some good point of composition with him; when Nicanor held much privy conference with him; which he could not so secretly carry, but that his negotiation was discovered, whereby the uproar in the Town was so far encreased, that Phoeon with many of his friends were accused, and driven to seek safeguard of their lives by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gave them his letters of commendation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polysperchon was in the Country of Phoeia, ready to enter with an Army into Attica. Thither came Phoeon with his companions, hoping well that the Letters which they brought, and their own deserts (having always been Friends to the Macedonians, as far as the good of their Country gave leave) should be enough to get patronage to their innocence. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polysperchon's familiar friend, went along with them (in an evil hour) who promised to himself and them great favour, by means of his acquaintance. But Polysperchon was an unfaithful man, very earnest in what he took in hand, yet either for want of Judgement in following them, or of honesty in holding the best of them, easily changing his intended courses, and doing things by the halves, which made him commonly fail of good success. For fear of Cassander he had offered wonderful kindness to the Athenians; this had caused them to love him: out of their love he gathered hope of deceiving them, which made him to change his mind, and seek how to get into his own hands those keys, with which Cassander held them fast locked up: finding himself disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false dishonourable man, he stood wavering between the contrary allurements of profit and reputation. To keep the Athenians perforce at his devotion, would indeed have done well: but the effecting of this began to grow desperate; and many Towns of importance in Greece, began to cast their eyes upon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore he thought it the wisest way to redeem their good opinion, by giving all contentment unto the popular faction, which was then grown to be Master of that City. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian Ambassadors come, reading (as one may say) upon Phoeon's heels, whom they were sent to accuse. These had solemn audience given to them in the King's presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for ostentations sake was glorified with all exterior shews of Majesty; yet all too little to change Arideus into Alexander: for he did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he saw others do. For beginning of the business, Polysperchon commanded that Dinarchus should be tortured and slain. This was enough to testify his hearty affection to the Commonalty of Athen, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake; whose Ambassadors he then bid to speak. When their errand was done, and answer to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Phoeon and the rest were pronounced guilty of Treason; but to give sentence, and do the execution upon them, was (for honours sake) referred unto the City of Athen, because they were Burgesses. Then were they sent away to Athen, where the rascal multitude, not suffering them to speak for themselves, condemned them to dye. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phoeon being very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to be of the less regard. Five and forty times had he been chosen Governor of the City, never suing for the place, but sent for when he was absent, so well was his integrity known, and so highly valued, even of such as were no pretenders to the same virtue. He was a good Commander in War, wherein, though his Actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and never unfortunate. Never did the City repent of having followed his counsel: nor any private man of having trusted his word. Philip of Macedon highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signs of his love) sent him two hundred Talents of silver, and offered to bestow upon him of four Cities in Asia, any one which he would chuse. But Phoeon refused all these and other gifts, howsoever importunately thrust upon him; relying well contented with his honest poverty: wherein he lived about fourscore years, and then was compelled by the unjust Judgement of wicked men to drink that poison, which by just Judgement of the righteous God, so infected the City of Athen, as from that day forwards never brought forth any worthy man resembling the virtue of their Ancestors.

SECT. XVI.

Of Polysperchon his vain Expedition against Cassander.

Not long after these things were done, Cassander, with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entered into Pirens; which news drew Polysperchon headlong into Attica, with a great Army but so ill victualled, that he was fain to depart without any thing done. Only he had given some impediment to the enemy; who, not contented with defending what he held, began to look out, and made new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himself unable to drive Cassander out of Athen, he left his son Alexander, with such number of men as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withstand his further encroaching. The greatest part of his Army he carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Country sure to himself, wherein Cassander had many friends.

His doings in Peloponnesus were such as they had been in other parts of Greece. First, he began to fight with Edicts, retorting the Democracy, or popular form of Government. He commanded that the principal Citizens, that had by Antipater been made Rulers, should be either slain, or driven into exile. This Decree took immediate effect in most places: the vulgar sort being very ready to seal the Charter of their freedom and authority, with the blood of those who had kept them in subjection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chief Citizens; and many which wished well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polysperchon meant to inflict an exemplary punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteen thousand serviceable men, well furnished of necessaries, and resolved to endure the worst. And need there was of such resolution. For Polysperchon coming thither with all his power, did so much, that he overthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall between them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came up to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised up an inner Wall, to bear out the next assault. The Assaults having failed to carry the Town at the first attempt, took much pains to clear the ground, and make fair way for their Elephants, whose violence

SECT. XVII.

Antigonus seeks to make himself an absolute Lord; and thereupon treats with Eumenes, who is disappointed him. Phrygia and Lydia won by Antigonus.

Antigonus was likely to overthrow all that came in their way. But the Townsmen perceiving their drift, prepared boards driven thorow with long nails, which they used as gall-throgs, bestowing them slightly covered, with the points upward, in the way by which the beasts were to pass. Neither did they let any to encounter them in front, but appointed certain light armed men to beat upon their sides with Arrows and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Wars. Of these provisions they made happy use in the next assault. For, by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemy chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driven back upon the Macedonians, whom they trampled under feet. Polysperchon came as ill furnished for long abode to Megalopolis as before to Athen. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the business quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requisite, he forsook the siege, with some loss, and much dishonour, leaving some part of his Army to lie before the Town for his credit.

After this he sent Clitus, his Admiral, to Sea, to join with Arideus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemy out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole fleet under Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where he fought with Clitus and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the overthrow, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor again, assuring himself of the Victory, as well he might. For he sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom he caused to be wafted over the Straits in small Vessels by night; these before day-light setting upon Clitus, drove his men, that lay securely on the Land, headlong into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriving, did assail them so lustily that few or none escaped them.

This loss at Sea, together with his bad success by Land, brought Polysperchon into great contempt. He had a good faculty in penning bloody Decrees, but when the execution was referred to his own sword, he could find the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiving that he had left them to shift for themselves, and was not able to give them protection against the enemy which lay in their bosoms, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a Governour of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the party of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly revolted unto him, as to an industrious man, and likely to prevail in the end. Thus was the whole Country left in a combustion, uneasy to be quenched; which presented unto Antigonus an opportunity, that he neglected not, of making himself Lord of Asia.

Antigonus had in Antipater's life-time a firm resolution, to make unto himself the utmost benefit that he might of the Army committed to his charge. And in fact he began his advancement of his purposes came the news of Antipater's death, even then, when all the business in Asiada was dispatched, and no more employment for the Army remaining, gave only the continuance of the siege of Nora, a small thing of it left, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutability, to which the present Estate was manifestly subject, would in continuance of some years which he might abide, work more for him, than his enemies in that space could work against him. His most fear was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Cattle his men and horses might grow feckly and unserviceable: which made him to practise many devices of keeping them in health and lusty. But when he had continued thus up in this manner about a year, his hopes came to good pass, and he was eased of his cares by Antigonus himself, whose forces held him besieged.

Antigonus knowing the great fidelity of Eumenes, and considering his fidelity thence unto Perdiccas, thought that he could not find in all the world a fitter man than him, to employ in managing those high designs wherein he doubted not that he should be withstood by the mightiest Princes of the Empire. He sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a better Lord than ever he had been, and the next man to himself, if things fell out as he desired: in regard whereof he required only his friendship, and thereupon forth he sent him an oath, which done, he might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora and enjoy his perfect liberty. Eumenes perusing the form of the oath, did perceive the meaning of Antigonus, which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the blood, rather to keep the Deorum, than upon any loyal intent, the binding words and sum of all were such, as tied him fast only to Antigonus, omitting all reversion of duty, to the King or any other. This he liked not, holding it unbecomely to become a sworn man to him, with whom he had fought for the mastery; and being assured that his voluntary alliance, which way loever he gave it, would be more acceptable and far more honourable than the court's propounded. Yet would he not therefore break off the negotiation, and wait for some better occasion of enlargement, which might perhaps be long in coming; but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, he prepared to give up his Hold and depart. As for the oath it self, when he came to take it, he made show of dislike, in that it was not solemn enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too circumspect in their testifying in their allegiance. The Macedonians which lay encamped before Nora, liked his words, and gave him leave to put in Olympias, and the children of Alexander, binding himself to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken upon him, as soon as he came down to the Sea side, to remove some of the Governors of the Provinces, behaving himself according to the authority which he had received of Antipater, to exercise in the time of War. Neither did he want sufficient pretence whereby to justify his proceeding. For, if Polyperchon might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the old man doing on his death-bed bequeathed unto him as a Legacy, without consent of the Prince and Souldiers; why might not he himself as well retain the Lieutenantship of Asia, that was granted unto him for the general good of the State, in presence of the whole Army, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordain what should seem convenient whilst he lived, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To give a fair colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith fatigued, he had threecore thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, and thirty Elephants in a readiness to answer them.

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to resist him, was Arideus Governor of Thrace, who fortified the Towns of his own Province, and fought to have won Cizaus, a fair Haven Town, and seated very conveniently for him, but was fain to go away without it. Hereupon Antigonus took occasion to command him out of the Country. Arideus was so far from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieve Eumenes. Nevertheless finding that he was unable of himself to make long resistance, he took such companies as he could draw along with him, and so passed over into Europe, to complain at the Court. The like fortune had Citrus, who ruled in Lydia, and fought the like remedy of his fortune, with some hope at first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished; and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

SECT. XVIII.

Antigonus pursues Eumenes. Eumenes having authority from the Court, raises great War against Antigonus in defence of the Royal House.

Antigonus having thus gotten into his hands all, or most of all Asia the less, was able to have entered Macedon and seized upon the Court; which that he forbore to do, it proceeded (as may seem) from some of these reasons. It would have bred as much jealousy in Cassander, as fear in Polyperchon, which might have brought them to terms of reconciliation: It would ask more time than he could spare; and the envy which followed the Protectorship was such, as he that had power enough without the office, ought rather to shun, than to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make war upon him in defence of the Royal house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well affected.

Against him therefore he bent his course, and with an Army of twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, made great haste towards Cilicia, hoping to surprise him before he should be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of these few that continued faithful to their dead Master, which being well known in the Court, he had commission sent unto him from thence to raise an Army, and make War upon Antigonus, taking of the King's treasure, as much as he should need. Other Letters also there were directed to all the Governors of Provinces, requiring them to give assistance to Eumenes, and be ordered by his direction: especially to the Captains of the old Souldiers, called the Argyrsphides, or Silver-shielded bands, commandment was given to beat his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, before this Authority was given him: but now he purposed with all the strength which he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royal blood. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring help to her, and her Nephew the Son of Alexander, and in the mean time to give her his advice in that which Polyperchon required of her: for she was desirous to return into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawful bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remain in Epirus, till such time as he could bring the war to a good issue; which done, he promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the seed of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire scarce any one could be found among the Noblemen, in whom Alexander's Mother, Wives, and Children, might repose firm confidence. Saving only this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian blood, born at Cardia, a City of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his own virtue had made it; his followers obeyed at their own discretion; and compelled he was to travel as far as Perusia, to gather together an Army sufficient to resist the enemies that pursued his heels.

SECT. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. Olympias takes Arideus and Eurydice, whom she cruelly puts to death.

NOW, forasmuch as in this present War all the Rulers of the Provinces did intermeddle and great alterations happened, not only in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it self, which brought a new face upon the State, by the extirpation of the Royal house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it convenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the War it self, to shew briefly how the great Ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawn into those courses, which overthrew most of them, and out of their ruins built the greatness of a few: as likewise to what extremity the faction brake out in Macedon it self, about the main Controversie of the Title to the Crown, whereupon all other quarrels were or should have been depending.

Arideus the King, being simple and fearful, did only what he was bidden.

Polyper-

Polyperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to advance the Son of Alexander by Roxane to the Kingdom, and become Governor to a King of his own making.

Eurydice the Queen discovering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing less than to let her husband stand serve as a Stale, keeping the Throne warm till another were grown old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turn.

Cassander held fresh in mind the danger wherein his family had been through Alexander's malice, together with the indignity offered to himself by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deciding one that adorned him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof, and the pleasure which he took in the amorous Queen, made him to resolve, both to suppress the lineage which he hated, and to maintain his beloved Mistress, either by supporting her weak Husband, or by taking her to be his own Wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent, who reigned over all, so as they might reign in their several Countries, and establish their authority in such wife, that it might not be taken from them.

Among these, Pholomy and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would have sufficed them to see it.

Pytho and Selenchus lying far off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach upon their neighbours. Against these, Eusegetes, and some others, with much ado hardly made resistance until such time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himself great matters, which he lived not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queen (as it is common with step dames) hated the children of her Husband by his other Wives. It was thought that she had given poison to Arideus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his body and wits. Now the considering, that Eumenes was too full of business to come home so soon as she wished that he should; and that Cassander daily prevailed in Greece: thought it the best way to join with Polyperchon, and let up as King, her Nephew Alexander, the Son of Roxane, removing Arideus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent he procured men among her kinsed in Epirus, and so took her way towards Polyperchon, who, journeying with her, entered into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these news, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to let aside all other business, and come to succour her. She her self by entreaties, gifts, and promises, drew to her party as many of the Macedonians as she could, until she thought her own side strong enough; and then taking her Husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polyperchon.

These two Queens met armed; as if the matter should have been determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke fricken, by the revolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soon as the Macedonians beheld Olympias coming to mind her former Estate; and the victorious Reigns of her Husband and Son, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding her self thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted, and made Prisoner with her Husband.

Olympias having obtained this Victory without blood, thought that all things would succeed as well, and upon the same considerations for which they had refused to bear arms against her, the Macedonians would not flit to maintain her, whatsoever her proceedings were. Having therefore shut up Arideus and his wife in a close room, where they could scarce turn round, she fed them throw a little hole, till after a while it came in her head (for fear lest the people should have commiseration of him, that had reigned almost six years and a half) to put them to death. So she delivered Arideus to some barbarous Thracians; who took away his life by cruel tortures; to Eurydice she sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of poison, willing her to chuse the instrument of her own death, who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yielded her neck to the Halter, having spent her last curles not in vain. Nicanor the Brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chief of his friends, did Olympias then chide out, all whom he commanded to be slain. His Brother Idolus was already dead and buried, the accused of poison given to Alexander, and thereupon he caused his Tomb to be thrown down, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this fury, began to condemn themselves, and the folly of Polyperchon, who had quite contrary to Antipater's charge given on his death-bed, called this outrageous woman to the Government of the Empire.

SECT. XX.

How Cassander was revenged on Olympias.

1. I.

The great Expedition of Cassander. Olympias shuts her self into Pydna, where Cassander besieged her. Eacides King of Epirus, coming to succour Olympias is forsaken and banished by his own Subjects.

Cassander that that time lay before Teges, in Peloponnesus; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, he never failed to take the City, nor to give order for the state of things in that Country, (though Alexander the Son of Polyperchon were there with an Army) but commending with them of Teges, he wished his associates to look to themselves as well as they could, till his return; and so in all haste he took his journey towards Macedon, carried headlong with the greedy desire of just revenge. The Atolians had taken the Straits of Ibermople, in favour of the Queen and Polyperchon, to hinder his passages; but he, not willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many ships as he could, great and small, with which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he divided his companies, appointing some under Galas a subtil Captain, to hold Polyperchon busied; who then lay encamped near to Perthibis, with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. She, having once prevailed by the respect given to her dignity took more care how to appear Majestical, than to make her self strong. To this end she made a solemn progress to Pydna, a Sea-Town, and well fenced, having in her company all the flower of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her young Son Alexander, heir to the great Alexander, by his Grandmother's delinquency: who during his minority, kept his Sovereign power in her own hands. But all this pomp served to little use against the violence of the enemy, that soon presented himself before the Walls; only it fed the besieged with a vain hope of succour, that would from all parts arrive, to rescue persons of their quality. And hereof there soon appeared a fair likelihood, which as soon vanished and went away in smoke.

For Antiochus King of Epirus made great haste to bring succour to Olympias his Cousin, with whom Deodamia his daughter was also shut up. Nevertheless, his Subjects were nothing forward in this Expedition; but finding certain passages taken in the way by Cassander's men, they called upon him to retire, and quit the enterprise. The King's impatience urging them to proceed, and the obstinate refusal of the Army, broke out at length into such terms, that when he had raged in vain against the multitude, his Authority, with which he thought to have prevailed upon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forsake his Kingdom, and to wander up and down in foreign Countries, a banished man, his people joyning with the enemy, against whom he had led them forth to War.

Pydna in the mean time was closed up strictly, both by Sea and Land, so that neither any could issue out of the City, nor any relief be conveyed into it, but it held out as long as any food was left: no memorable service being done there, whilst great Actions were managed abroad.

†. II.

A continuation of Olympias her story. Polyperchon defeated. Extreme Famine in Pydna. Olympias yields to Cassander.

Now, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of Eumenes, and Antigonus in this place, leaving Olympias yet a while to the hour of her destiny; which grows the faster upon her, because the may discern it coming: yet that we may not be compelled to interrupt the course of our Narration, by inserting her Tragedy in the midst of things not manifestly coherent with it: we will here (as elsewhere we have done, and elsewhere must) continue to an end one History, that we may not, therewith be distracted, when we shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the besieged, remaining in Polyperchon, was in like manner disappointed as their former trust had been, which was reposed in the succours of the Epirots. For Callas who was sent against him, found the means to corrupt the greatest part of the Army with money, leaving him within a little while to slenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other business of War, than a swift retreat. When Famine had so far prevailed in the City, that the Horses were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead Carcasses of their fellows, and saw-dust being given to the Elephants for Provender; some of the Souldiers obtaining the Queens leave (who could not deny it) others without asking leave, yielded themselves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieved, and sent abroad into the Country. The news of the Queens affairs, dispersed by these men, did so affright her well-willers, that such as had reserved themselves to the event, came in space, and submitted to Cassander. At length, when the mortality was so great in the Town, that the living were extolled with the noisome scent of the dead; Olympias bethought her self of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that she had: wherewith her success was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Town, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to be unto her as a house of torment, and a Gaol, out of which she should not be delivered, but unto an evil death. Being therefore utterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, unaccustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered composition, and with much labour hardly obtained of Cassander (who having fetched her Galley out of the Haven, accounted himself as good as master of her body) a grant of her own life. Immediately upon her apprehension, Pella, the chief City of the Kingdom, was yielded to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Arrianus (to whom Olympias had given charge of such forces as were left abroad in the Country, taking courage from the success of some petty services where-in he had prevailed) began to promise himself great unlikelyhoods. But Olympias, to win Cassander's favour, very earnestly required him upon his faith to her, that he should give it up. He did so, and presently after was killed by his private enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him upon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seek Innovation.

†. III.

The death of Olympias, and her Conditions.

When Eumenes had now heard sorrowful tidings of all her friends, the her self was called into question, and accused in an Assembly of the Macedonians, for the murders (they were so styled in her affidavit, which in time of prosperity she called Justice) by her committed. There was she (being not heard, nor called to speak) condemned to die. The fate was commenced and prosecuted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had slain. But it was at Cassander's instigation, who (to hasten the execution) sent her word, that he would furnish her with a ship, and when she refused, saying, that she would plead for her self, and tell her own tale; he dissembled no longer, but sent unto her such men, as hated her most, who took away her miserable life. She was Daughter, and Sister, unto two Kings of Epirus: a Wife and Mother unto two the mightiest Kings, of that, or many other Ages; a stout Lady, and of unprovable chastity; but her ambition was boundless, her hatred unappeasable, and her fury in revenge most unwomanly. Her perverse conditions made her Husband seek other Wives and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him and them. She was thought privy to her Husband's death: after which, very cruelly, she slew his late wife Cleopatra, having first murdered one of her two children in her arms, and with a beastly fury broiled the other alive in fire, in a Copper-bason. For

For these things, her Son Alexander (otherwise loving her well) forbade her to meddle in the Government of Macedon. But God, more severe unto cruel Tyrants, than only to hinder them, their wills, permitted her to live, and fulfil the rest of her wickedness (which was his justice upon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others;) after all which, he rewarded her malice, by returning it upon her own head.

† IV.

Cassander celebrates the Funeral of Arides and Eurydice; and seeks to make himself King of Macedon.

After her death, Cassander gave honourable burial to Arides and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his own possibilities of greatness, he married the Lady Thessalonica, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the Daughter of King Philip, by another of his Wives; that by her he might have some title to the Crown. For the same end he committed Roxane, and her young Son to close Prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to increase his fame, and purchase love, built a City, called by his own name Cassandria, that soon grew to be very great and powerful. He re-edified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it unto the old Inhabitants, after it had lain twenty years waste, being utterly razed by Alexander. By these means, especially by the reparation of Thebes, wherunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained enemies unto him; and they with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leaving him therefore daily prevailing in Greece, we will return to them, who contended in Asia, for the titles, but larger Provinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. IV.

Of the great Lordship which Antigonus got in Asia.

SECT. I.

The Journey of Eumenes into Persia. His wife dealing with those that joynd with him.

Eumenes, having joynd unto his company the Argyraspiders, made haste into the Eastern parts, to take possession of those Countries, according to his Commission, and strengthen himself against Antigonus. He took his journey through Calosyria and Phoenicia, hoping to reclaim those Provinces, the rest of Syria usurped (as hath been shewed) by Ptolemy, to the King's obedience. But to effect this, his haste of his pulling forward was too great, his Army too little, and the readiness of the people, to return their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which Impediments, one inconvenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the less effectual. The Captains of the Argyraspiders were so froward, that they scorned to repair to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so unsteady, that they might more easily have dealt with open Traytors. It was not expedient, that he, being General, should weaken his authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keep them in order by compulsion. Therefore he feigned, that Alexander had appointed unto him, in a dream, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich pavilion, wherein an empty throne was placed, as if Alexander himself had been present at their consultations. Thus he freed himself from their vain pride; but of their faith he could have no assurance. Yet when Ptolemy requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So he marched on, sending before him the King's Warrant; which Pytho and Selenus refused to obey; not as rejecting the King's Authority, but excepting the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Army, for the death of Cratæus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to rely upon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected than his affairs required, and were not to be dealt with by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand through the Country of Babylon; in such wise that Selenus, having in vain assayed to hinder him, by opening the sluices of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Pencester and the rest of the Eastern Lords, who were glad of his company, because of the differences between Pytho, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiority grew very hot among them, every one finding matter enough to feed his own humour of self-worthiness. But the former desire of assembling in one pavilion, made all quiet; the conclusion ever being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giving advice, and best able to reward, by means of the Authority given him, to take what he pleased of the King's treasures. By these means he won to himself many of those, who had most power to do good or hurt.

SECT.

SECT. II.

How Antigonus coming to set upon Eumenes, was driven off with loss.

A Ntigonus, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Province of Sufa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and drive him further from the King's treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soon as he had made himself strong enough, he removed out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, he marched directly against the countries, with intent to give them battle. Eumenes had fortified the Castle of Sufa, and was retired back toward Perfa, keeping the River of Tigris between him and his pursuers. The passages of the River were well guarded, and good counsel kept upon Antigonus, to observe which way he took. Before he came to Tigris it fell, he was to pass over Coprates, a great River, and not fordable, which he thought to do by small Vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Army had gotten over, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge upon Tigris, came with a thousand horse, and four thousand foot, to see their demerour: and hindring them out of order, charged them, brake them, and drove them head-long back into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned: very few escaping with life, except four thousand that yielded themselves prisoners in fight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieve them. This loss made Antigonus glad to fall off, and the heat power of the Dog days, breeding dangerous diseases in his Army, by which many perished, caused him to remove as far as into Media. So he took Pytho with him (leaving Seleucus to besedge the Castle of Sufa) and seeking to go the nearest way, passed through savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arrive in Media with his Troops, that were quite heart-broken.

SECT. III.

Of Eumenes his cunning. A Battle between him and Antigonus.

AFTER his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their business. Fain he would have had them to enter upon those Provinces, which Antigonus had left behind him; to which also the Captains of the Arsyaspides or Silver shields, were very inclinable, as desiring to draw near to Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose Dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their own particular Estates, and would needs march Eastward. These carried it; for the Army was not strong enough to divide it self into parts.

When they came into Perfa, Peucestes ruling there, treated them royally, and fought by all means to win the Souldiers love to himself. Eumenes perceiving whereunto those doings tended, forsake him a while to keep good cheer, till the time of Wardrew near. Then did he feign an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Governour of Armenia, to Peucestes himself: The purport whereof was; that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent over a great Army under Polyperchon, to join with Eumenes. These news, as they filled the Camp with vain joy, so they wrought in all mens minds a great willingness to obey Eumenes by whom was the likeliest appearance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, he being far the most sufficient Commander, as they found soon after. For when Antigonus, coming out of Media, drew near unto them, Eumenes, by some mischance was fallen sick, and fain to be carried in a Litter; the Army marched in very bad array, and was likely to have been forced to take battle in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captains were amazed, was carried about the Army in his Litter, and upon the sudden did call his men into good form, that Antigonus, perceiving him afar off, could not refrain from giving him deserved commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to his Captains, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiving him, he came to the trial of a Battle. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, he was inferior in number both of horse and foot by a third part. The Battle was fought with variable success, and great loss on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the Victory was uncertain. For Eumenes could not force his men to lye far from their carriages: by which means Antigonus (who had a more absolute command over his) encamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies, which was accounted the sign of victory; for he buried his own, and gave leave to his enemies craving it, to do the like. But a greater sign of victory had Eumenes: For he abode still in the same place, and not only buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Country round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (having tarried but one day) to steal away by night, and return into Media, from whence he came.

SECT. IV.

Of divers stratagems practised by Antigonus and Eumenes, one against the other.

THUS did the War continue doubtful, and was protracted to a great length, each part having stout Souldiers, and skilful Generals: but the side which had hitherto prevailed, being hindered by the equal authority of many, from pursuing all advantages to the best, Antigonus grew daily weaker; in men and reputation, so that to repair himself he could find no way faster, than to put all to adventure. He knew that his enemies lay in wintering places, quartering far asunder, so that if he could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distress. Between him and them, the way was not long, being only nine days journey, but very bad, through a rough dry wilderness, hardly passible. Another way, fairer and leading through a Country well peopled, but requiring twenty five days journey, he forsake; partly for the length, partly and chiefly, because

SECT. V.

The conspiracy of Peucestes and others, against Eumenes his life.

BY these means Eumenes won great honour, and was by the whole Army acknowledged a most expert General, and well worthy of the chief command. But Peucestes, and the other Captains, giddy of their own much insufficiency, were so transported with Envy, that they could no longer contain their vile thoughts, but held communication, as upon a necessary point, how they might find means to murder him.

Surely, it is great injustice to impute the mischief contrived against worthy men, to their own proud carriage, or some other ill deserving: For, though it often happen, that small vices do serve to counterpoize great virtues; (the sense of evil being more quick and lasting than of good) yet he shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimony, will think it a part of wisdom to find good reason of the evils done to virtuous men, which oftentimes have no other cause than virtue it self. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of singular courtesy, of a very sweet conversation among his friends, and carefully by all gentle means to win their love, that seemed to bear him any secret ill affection. It was his meer virtue that overthrew him, which even they that fought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that he should not be slain, before the battle were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be governed by his direction. Of this Treason he was quickly advertised by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom he used to borrow money when he needed not, to the end that they should be careful of his good, for fear of losing their own. Considering therefore, and discouraging with himself of the villain intended against him, he made his last Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of secret: which done, he revolved many things in his mind; being doubtful what course he had best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royal blood, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to seek their help, that needed his. To make his own peace with Antigonus, had been against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that he forbore either to lose the battle willingly, or to flee into Cappadocia, and make shift for himself among his old friends. At length he resolved to do his best against the common enemy, and afterwards look to himself as well as he might.

he would come undiscovered. So therefore taking his journey in the dead of Winter, he forbade unto his men the use of fire by night, because he would not have them discovered afar off. This commandment had been well observed four or five days, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselves, being near to their ways end. The light of these fires gave notice of their coming, which being reported to Peucestes, and other Captains, they were loath to withhold the sudden danger, that in all haste they betook themselves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the news, began to hearten his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leisurely, and willing them to abide, and draw up their men together. They could scarce believe him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He took with him some companies of the readiest men, wherewith he occupied certain tops of mountains, looking toward the Camp of Antigonus: there he chose a convenient ground to encamp upon, and made great store of fires in sundry places, as if the whole Army had been present. This was a sorrowful spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himself prevented of his purposes; and began to fear lest he should be compelled to fight, whilst his men were tired with a long and painful journey. Therefore he resolved to turn aside, and take the way to such places, as might better serve to refresh his Army. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how ready Eumenes would be upon all advantages. But after a while considering that no enemy stirred about him, he began to pause, and think in himself, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some Inhabitants of that Desert to be taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had seen no other Army than his thereabout, but only a few men that kept fires on the Hill-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to find that he had been so deluded. Therefore he went against these Troops with great fury, meaning to take sharp vengeance on them, for having so deceived him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arrived there, which could not be forced without much business, and long stay. All the Army was come, save only Eudamus, Captain of the Elephants, who, besides those beasts, had no more than four hundred horsemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this supply coming to his enemies, sent above two thousand Horse, and all his light-armed foot-men, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was fain to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and so to defend himself as well as he could; for his horsemen, overlaid with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driven to run away upon the spur. Neither knew they, who fate upon the Elephants, which way to turn them, for on all sides they received wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremity there appeared brave Troops of horse and foot, that came unexpected to the rescue; and charging the Assaults upon the back, drove them to seek their own safety by speedy flight. These were sent by Eumenes, who though he knew not what his Adversary meant to do, yet he knew very well what was fittest for him to do: and therefore, playing both games himself, provided the remedy.

SECT. VI.

The last battle between Antigonus and Eumenes.

THE Souldiers, especially those old bands of the Silver-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victory, but only to bring them into the field, and set them in array; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacrity was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chief Commanders were so mischievously bent against him, that they could not endure to think of being beholding to him for the Victory. Yet he ordered the battle so well, that without their own great fault, they could hardly fail of getting the upper hand.

Before the Armies came to joining, a horseman from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice unto the followers of Antigonus, That their wickedness in fighting against their own Fathers, would now be punished, as it well deserved. This was not spoken in vain. For the Silver-shields were men of threescore or seventy years old, and strengthened more by continual exercise, than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as having passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight.

Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often been beaten by them, and were now to try their last hope with these resolute warriors, the most ancient and best regarded of all Alexander's Souldiers) grew very penitive, and advanced heavily, suspecting their own cause, and fearing that the threatening uttered would prove true.

Antigonus was now again far the stronger in horse, which gave him cause of great hope; the ground on which they were to fight, being a plain levelled field. Placing therefore himself, and his son Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Python, he did set forward courageously against the Enemies, that were ready to give him a sharp entertainment.

Eumenes took unto him Peucestes, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battle, in the face of Antigonus; meaning both to prevent the Traytors, his Companions, of all means to make head against him on the sudden; and (withal) to give proof of his own valour, which perhaps he should no more do, in the face of all his Enemies. In the right wing, opposite unto Python, he bestowed the weakest of his Horse and Elephants, under one Philip, a honest man and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a reasonable retreat, expecting the event of the other side.

So they joined very fiercely. Antigonus, labouring to make himself master of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to win such a victory upon his open enemies, as might give him leisure and opportunity to deal with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being, even in their own opinions, far inferior to those whom they must encounter, were at the first burnt presently defeated by the Silver-shields, who flew above five thousand of them, losing of their own not one man. But in Horse, Eumenes was so over-matched, that he could not repel Antigonus, who pressed him very hard, but was fain to stand wholly upon defence. Yet his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the Enemy could not win one foot of ground upon him, until such time as Peucestes, with one thousand five hundred Horse, withdrew himself out of the battle, leaving his companions fighting to defend his back.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush among his Enemies, labouring to break open the way unto Antigonus himself. And though he failed of his purpose; yet with great slaughter he did beat upon them which came in his way, that the victory hung a long time in suspense, uncertain which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a slight sandy mould, through the trampling of Horses, Men and Elephants, did cast up such a cloud of dust, as hindered the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this advantage, dispatched away some companies of Horse, that passed undiscovered beyond Eumenes his battels, and came to his carriages, which lay about half a mile from the place of fight, slenderly guarded (for that the whole body of the Army lay between them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Peucestes retired himself no farther than unto the carriages, he might not only have defended them, but peradventure have surprized those which came to surprize them, and so have done as good a piece of service as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the event; and Eumenes was so over-laboured both in body and mind, that he could not possibly give an eye to every place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himself every way overcharged, began to give back, and withdrew himself and his companies in good order, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from loss. The Antigonus had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were all content to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come again; as fain he would have done.

The loss of the carriages was reported unto him, as soon as he had any leisure to hear how things went: whereupon he presently ordered his men for a fresh charge, and sent for Peucestes that was not far off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby he trusted not only to recover their own goods, but to enrich themselves with the spoils of the enemies. Peucestes not only refused to join with him, but immediately withdrew himself into a safer place, where he might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By this the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to return into their Camps. Yet Antigonus conceived hope of doing somewhat more, and therefore taking half his horsemen, he waited upon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other half he committed to Python, willing him to set upon the Silver-shields in their retreat; which yet he forbore to do, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battle ended, wherein wherein Antigonus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foot; but the spoil which he got, by surprizing his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

SECT. VII.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus and slain.

EUMENES, coming into his Camp, and finding the Silver-shields extremely discontented with their misfortune, began to cheer them up, and put them in hope of recovering all with advantage. For their brave demeanour that day had so crushed the enemy, that he had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much less able to draw their Carts after him, through that great Wilderness, over the high Mountains.

But these persuasions availed nothing. Peucestes was gone; the other Captains would needs return into the high Countries; and the Souldiers had no desire either to flee or to fight, but only to recover their goods. Wherefore Tentamen, one of the two Captains of the Silver-shields (who had in former times readily consented unto traitorous motions, in hope of gain, but was letted by his partner Anigens) finding, as he thought a fit occasion of making himself great, and winning the love of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore unto those old Souldiers their goods, which he had taken, being the only reward of their services, in the Wars of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a subtle man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with little entreaty, perform a great deal more than they promised; and therefore he lovingly entertained the messengers, filling them with hopes of far greater matters than they desired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make War against him. This answer pleased them so well, that they forthwith devised how to deliver him alive. Wherefore coming about him, as at other times to do their duty, and pretending more joy of their victory, than sorrow of their loss, which they said they would redeem by another fight; in the midst of this goodly talk, they leapt upon him, caught hold of his sword, and bound him fast. So they halted him away; and, stopping their ears against all persuasions, would not yield so far as to loosen one of his hands, and let him kill himself, but brought him alive (that was their own General, under whom they had obtained many victories) as it had been in triumph, into the Camp of their enemies.

The press of men, running out of the Camp to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was fain to send a guard of Horsemen and Elephants, to keep him from being smothered; whom he could not suddenly resolve either to kill or save. Very few there were that sued for his life, but of these, Demetrius the son of Antigonus was one, the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly, thinking, that if he were saved, he would soon be the chief in reputation, for his great ability. So, after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded that it was the safest way to put him to death; which intending to have done by famine (perhaps because he would keep it a while in his own power, to reverse the sentence, as desiring, if it might be, to have him live his friendly halt of other business made him do it by the sword).

To this end came all the travel of that worthy General Eumenes; who had with great widom, fidelity and patience, laboured in vain to uphold the family which God had purposed to cast down. He is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutability, but more notable was his Government of himself, in all his changes. Adversity never lessened his courage, nor prosperity his circumspection. But all his virtue, industry and wit, were cast away; in leading an Army, without full power, to keep it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered by Gesser de Coligny, Admiral of France in our days, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soon after in the massacre of Paris: That rather than to lead again an Army of Voluntaries, he would dye a thousand times.

Antigonus himself gave to the body of Eumenes Honourable Funerals; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserved vengeance. One chief Captain of the Silver-shields he burnt alive; many of the other Captains he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Silver-shields, that had betrayed to worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader that should carry them into far Countries, under pretence of War, but with a pivity charge, to confuse them all, as perjured wretches, letting none of them return alive unto his friends and kindred, or to much as once behold the Seas that beat upon the shores of Greece and Macedonia.

SECT. VIII.

How Antigonus slew Python, and occupied Media. How he removed Governours of Provinces, and made himself Lord of Persia, carrying away Peucestes.

THE two Armies being joined thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter: the common Souldiers idly; the principal men intently bent unto the business ensuing. Python began to consider his own delinquencies for the whole War had been chiefly maintained by the strength, and riches of his Province. Besides, he thought himself as good a man as Antigonus, unless it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he judged easily to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assay them with great liberality. But in following this course he was driven by necessity to trust many of whom he stumbled upon some, that were unscrupulous, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discovered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Python) dissembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as brothers of diffidence between him, and his honourable friend, unto whom he meant to commit the Government of all those Countries: his own business calling him into the lower Asia. These reports coming daily to his ears, did finely delude Python. By his greatest with Alexander; his Authority thority in that Province where they lay, whether he was Governor, and the love of the Souldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintain, even an offensive War. But what need had he to use the sword, when he was likely without contention, to obtain more than his own asking? Therefore he came as soon as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to divide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing, less than to yield to any such division. As soon as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to dye, and slain out of hand. For Antigonus, having begun with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting down indifferently all that stood in his way: but swam carefully thorow the blood, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this business was ended, he appointed a new Governor in Media, to order the Province, and a Captain, to suppress all commotions: thinking alike that the power and authority, so divided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were derived.

After this he marched into Persia, where he was entertained as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to shew how well he understood his own mightiness. For he placed and displaced, at his own pleasure, Governors in all Provinces, leaving none in Office, that were not his own creatures, except such as lay too far off to be dislodged easily.

Ptolemy, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheer to redeem old offences; but was deceived, having to do with one that could not be taken with such baits: he was carried away, and flattered with goodly words of promise, that never after took effect. Thus he, that envied the virtue of his friend, was driven to flatter (in vain) the fortune of his enemy, after which he led a most contemptible life, till he died obscurely a man forgotten.

SECT. IX.

How Seleucus was chased out of Babylon by Antigonus. The great riches of Antigonus.

Seleucus was the next in this Vilitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenour of good will to Antigonus, & now gave proof of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Captain of the Castle of Susa to meet him on the way, rendering unto him that strong Place, and all the Treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonus (though having in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly believe it; but used him with excessive kindness, for fear of good a mood should change. In that Castle he found all the Treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Persian Kings, which, added to his former store of money, made up five and twenty thousand Talents. Having all this, he might well account himself a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happiness. But large Dominion was the mark at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent to leave no Country behind his back, that should not acknowledge him for Sovereign Lord. Coming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus, with all possible demonstration of love, and honoured with presents befitting the Majesty of a King. All this he accepted with great gravity, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the revenues of that Province. This demand Seleucus held unreasonable; saying, That it was not needful for him to render unto any man an account of that Province, which was given unto him, in respect of his many good services to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerful, who urged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessity, moved Antigonus to press him, thus; but only the desire to pick matter of quarrel against him, whereof it was likely that he should find such issue, as Pythion and Peneus had done. Therefore taking with him only fifty horse, he conveyed himself away, and fled into Ptolomy's Dominions; desiring him to protect him from such a man as went about to oppress all, that in former times had been his betters, or at least his equals. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Countries were yielded unto him without battel, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his desire, having received many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a strange Prophecy to Antigonus, bidding him look well to himself, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, he should recover Babylon, yea, win all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battel. Antigonus believes may give credit to this tale. Had it been true, methinks Antigonus rather should have hanged those Chaldeans, for giving him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whom the Destinies preserved for so great purposes. When he had settled things at Babylon, he took his journey into Cilicia, where he wintered. There he took up ten thousand Talents more of the King's treasures, and calling up his accounts, found his yearly in-come to amount unto eleven thousand Talents.

Of the great War between Alexander's Captains: and how they assumed the Name and State of Kings.

SECT. I.

The Combination of Ptolomy, Cassander, and others against Antigonus. Their Demands, and his Answer.

His great riches, and the rest of his Power, made Antigonus dreaded, envied and suspected, whereby he was quickly embarked in a new War. Ptolomy, Cassander and Lysimachus, had privily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason than of his own accord he seemed like to yield unto. Of their practices he had some notice; the good entertainment given unto Seleucus, giving him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Ambassadors to them severally, entreating them to continue firm in their love toward him, that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparations against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomy, it being likely that a good Army should prevail more than a fair message. Therefore, as soon as the season of the year would permit, he took the way toward Syria, and was encountered by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much rejoice at his victory obtained against Eumenes their common enemy, and the honour that he had thereby gotten. In which War, so far as they were his Confederates, must have endured great loss, with hazard of their whole Estates, if the contrary faction had prevailed; they held it very just, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that voyage, wherein they had been all adventurers. Wherefore they desired him, that making between them all an equal division of the treasures that were in his hands (a thing easy to be done) he would also take some convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might well be to every one's liking, if he would make over Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering upon the Hellespont; to Lysimachus: for whereas his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victory, he might well spare some of those Western Provinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomy, he would not crave any new addition, but rest contented within his own Territories. Provided always, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late War, might be restored to his own, out of which he had been driven so injuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent unto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtain with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses received, he should yet be able to redeem Peace whensoever he listed, with these, or perhaps with calter conditions. Neither was he so weak, to give away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for fear only, lest he should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to find them work, more than enough to defend their own. Therefore he roundly answered the Ambassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victory, which he alone without other mens help had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, having by his means kept their Government, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polyperchon, and the council of Estate in Macedon. But what marvel was it, if they considered not how he had saved them, seeing one that had forgotten the time, when coming to him as a fugitive, and begging succour, he was by his meer bounty relieved, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (said he) in those days command me to surrender Provinces, and give him his equal share of my Treasures; but (for his Father's sake) desired me to pity him, and help him against his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Army, and Fleet, on confidence whereof he now pretumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, How can he complain of wrong, that durst not stay to plead his right? I did use him well, but his conscience told him that he had deferved ill: else he would not have fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their own, which some of them can hardly justify. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomy's proceedings, and after him to deal with others, if they continue to provoke me.

SECT. II.

The preparation and beginnings of the War.

When the Ambassadors were dismissed with this answer, nothing was thought upon but War. Antigonus perceiving that he should be invaded from Europe, as soon as he was entred into Syria, let his Nephew Ptolomy to guard the Sea coasts, and hinder Cassander from landing in Asia: giving him also charge, to drive out of Cappadocia, some that were already sent over to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not unprovided of money; to draw friends to his side, and raise up troubles to his enemies. Especially, he laboured to make himself the strongest by Sea, to which purpose he rather hastened, than forsook his journey into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent commodities for building of a Navy. Therefore, having erected Beacons, and laid post-horses throughout all Asia, to give swift advertisement of all occurrences, he invaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to maintain the field.

Ptolomy lay in Egypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloved and honoured of the people as their natural Lord; his other Provinces he kept with a few Garrisons, better serving to contain the people within obediences, than to confront a Foreign enemy. So Antigonus took many Cities and Places of that Country, and began to set great numbers of Artificers on work in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these businesses he consumed a year and three months; not idly. For he took Joppa and Gaza, which were yielded unto his discretion, and well used. The strong City of Tyrrus held out long, but was compelled in the end by famine, to render it self upon compulsion, that Ptolomy's Souldiers might depart with their Arms, which was permitted.

Ptolomy was not asleep, whilst these things were in doing, though he kept himself within the bounds of Egypt, as indeed it behoved him to do. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plain field, but likely they were to encrease, which made him willing to protract the time. Nevertheless by Sea (where his enemy was as yet unready) he sent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Selenus had the chief command.

Selenus passed with an hundred sail along the coast of Syria, in full view of Antigonus and his Army, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then governed by many petty Lords of whom the greatest adhered to Ptolomy, the rest were by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptians with sharp steel.

The same commodity of aid by Sea, encouraged the President of Caria (called also Cassander, but not the Son of Antipater, howsoever by the painful and learned Writer Reinerus Reineccius, he is, by some oversight, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolomy and his Confederates, and busily employ in their quarrel all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutrality, and thereby enjoyed rest; but now he threw himself into dangerous War, chusing rather to undergo trouble at hand, than to fall under certain ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would have overwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

SECT. III.

How each party sought to win the assistance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration against Cassander. Alexander the Son of Polyperchon revolted from Antigonus who had jet him up.

IN the mean season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure unto them the people of Greece, whose aid, which way soever inclined, was of great importance. Herein at the first, Antigonus sped so well by large effusion of his treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedemonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom he waged eight thousand; and caused Polyperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to row himself again, and taking upon him the title of Captain of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopeful beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kind. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, he called together both his own Souldiers, and all the Greeks and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, that Cassander had very cruelly slain Olympias, Mother to the great Alexander; and not herewith contented, had thrust up in close prison the poor Lady Roxane, Alexander's Wife, and his Son begotten on her body. That all this proceeded from a desire to make himself King over the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Lady Thesalonica, daughter to King Philip, a match unfit for a man of no greater parentage than he, to join with him in marriage. That in manner despite of those dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olympians, rooted out by Philip, in a new City by him built, and called by his own name Cassandria; and had re-edified the City of Thebes, which for the great treason of the Inhabitants, was levelled with the ground by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons he required them to make a Decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute liberty the Lady Roxane, and her Son; and should yield obedience to the Lord Lieutenant General of the Empire (by which name Antigonus himself was understood) or else should be reputed a Traytor, and open Enemy to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should be restored unto freedom: this he did, not because he was careful of their good, but for the need which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was persuaded, that not only the Greeks would adhere unto him, as to their loving Patron, and fall off from Cassander, but that the rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardless of nothing but his own benefit, would correct their opinion, and think him the most faithful of all others to the Royal Blood. But concerning his loyalty to the young Prince, the world was too wise to be deceived with vain shews. His undertaking for the liberty of the Greeks was more effectual, and got easier belief, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Ptolomy strove to be as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to win to himself that valiant Nation, which afforded afforded men far more serviceable in War, than were to be found in any Province of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all for ease, deceived himself, not without great cost. For he gave to Alexander the Son of Polyperchon five hundred Talents, willing him to set the War on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appear that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassander's men had with much blood-shed, grievously afflicted the contrary faction, and he himself perceiving, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way to make what use he could of them, that were not like to continue long his. Finally, perceiving that Alexander came furnished with plenty of gold, wherewith he was able not only to win the doubtful, but to corrupt such as might seem best assured; he thought it a part of wisdom, to surrender upon fair conditions, that which he could not assure himself to hold any long time by force. Therefore he sent one to deal with Alexander about the matters in controversy; telling him, that Antigonus was very skillful in setting men together by the ears, not caring who prevailed, but only desiring to have them weary themselves, whilst he was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might find opportunity to set upon the stronger. It therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keep in his purse the five hundred Talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus, it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander; provided, that he should from thenceforth renounce all confederacy made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure and faithful league with Ptolomy, Cassander, and the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise he might well persuade himself, that the Country which his Father could not keep, when he was indeed the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in half be won by him, that was only the Factor of a proud injurious man, so filling himself, but not acknowledging by others.

Alexander had lived a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these wars, among whose followers it was not hard to discover the intent; which he did not carry very secret of making himself absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soon entreated to accept of good an offer; and did not stick to enter into that League, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subject unto no man's controul.

Howbeit, this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, by treason of the Sicionians, who thinking thereby to have made themselves free, were soon after vanquished in battle by Cratepolis, Alexander's Wife, a discreet and valiant Lady. She in revenge of her Husband's death, crucified thirty of the Citizens taken in fight; and having by severity taught them obedience, did afterwards continue her Army in good order, and governed those places the held, with the commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

SECT. IV.

The Aetolians rise against Cassander in favour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A Fleet and Land-Army of Antigonus utterly defeated by Ptolomy's Lieutenant. In what terms the War stood at this time. Antigonus draws near to Greece.

Antigonus when he found, that with so much money he had only bought an enemy, began to raise troubles to Cassander, and his other adversaries in Greece, by stirring up the Aetolians against them: likewise he laboured to win to his party the Islands in the Greek Seas, by whose alliance he might be the better able to deal with Ptolomy, that greatly prevailed by reason of his strong Fleet. But neither of these attempts had the success which he expected. The Aetolians, a factious Nation, and always envious the greatness of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gains equalled not their losses. Cassander was some of their own Country, fortified the drepanians against them, and compelled Glaucias, King of the Lyrans, whom he vanquished in battle, to forsake their side, and bind himself, to bear no Arms against Cassander's friends.

On the other side, as many petty Islands were drawn to joy with Antigonus, so the Fleet of the Rhodians under Theodatus, who was Admiral to Antigonus, palling along the Coast of Asia towards Cyprus, with an Army under conduct of Perilas marching on the shore for mutual assistance, was quite overthrown by Ptolomy's Navy. Polyclitus, who in Ptolomy's behalf had been sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no need of his service in that Country, because Alexander was come over to their side, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly surprized. He rode with his Fleet behind a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambush, wherinto Perilas falling, was taken prisoner, with many of his men, and many were slain, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admiral perceiving this, made all haste to help his fellows that were on Land; but whilst he with all his Fleet were intensive only to that business, Polyclitus appeared at their backs; who as soon as he perceived their disorder, hastened about the Cape, and charging them behind, suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deal with Ptolomy about some composition. First, he sent Ambassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yield to the demands of Ptolomy, so the party was vain.

Hitherto each party seemed to have indifferently sped in the War, and thereby to have equal cause of hope and fear. This late Victory, with the good success of his affairs in Cyprus, did seem to make a mends to Ptolomy for his losses in Syria. Likewise the revolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the confederacy made between the Aetolians and him; as also those petty skirmishes that had been in Asia the less, to Antigonus his advantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but adverse to him, and by the troubles brought upon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the loss of his men, men, money and ships, no otherwise than as the pairing of his nails, that were left long enough, and would easily grow again, but the enlargement of his Territory by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate; as if thereby he had fed upon a limb of Ptolomy his enemy, and strengthened the body of his own Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoise the bad, he meant to proceed as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long, wanting to them, that want no money.

That which most molested him, was the attempts of his enemies upon Asia the less, wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to fear, lest the people being tied unto him by no bond of allegiance, might upon small occasion revolt from him, to men of as honourable reputation as he himself. To prevent this, and to be nearer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affairs did seem to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Army in Syria, under his Son Demetrius, to whom being then but two and twenty years old, he appointed many ancient Captains, as Alliances, or rather as Directors: the rest he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

SECT. V.

How Lyfimachus and Cassander vanquished some enemies, raised against them by Antigonus. The good success of Antigonus in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against Cassander.

THE coming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the process of his business thereabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to think upon molesting him in Asia: they themselves were held over-hardly to their own work on Europe side. Seuthes a King of the Thracians, joining with some Towns that rebelled against Lyfimachus, brought also the bordering Sythians into the quarrel. All these relied upon Antigonus, who was to help them with money and other aid. The Ætolians likewise took courage, and rose against Cassander, having Æscander, lately restored to the Kingdom of Epirus, their Alliance. But Lyfimachus gave unto his Rebels no time to confirm themselves. He suddenly presented himself before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by fear to return unto their former duty. He fought a battle with the Sythians and wild Thracians, and drove them out of the Country. Finally, he overcame Seuthes; and following the heat of his Victory slew Pausanias in Battle, whom Antigonus had sent over with an Army's and all his men he did either put to ransom or fill up with them his own Bands. The like success had Philip, Cassander's Lieutenant, against the Ætolians. For he waited their Country; fought with the Epirotes, that came to help them; and after the victory, fought again with their forces joyned in one, overthrowing them, and killing Æscander that unfortunate King. Finally, he drove the Ætolians out of most of their Country, and forced them to seek their safety among the wild Mountains. Of the Epirotes he sent as Prisoners to Cassander, the principal Authors of the King's restitution, and of the present War. Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his Adversaries with painful travels; after which they remained only Gavres. Antigonus himself at fair leisure won all Caria the whitts, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing liberty upon all the Cities he took out of Cassander's hands. The whole Country of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Isle of Eubœa, and many places of the firm Land, were by those means won to be his in true and vehement affection, ready to do or suffer any thing for him that had made so evident a demonstration of his readiness, to give them the liberty in deed, which others had promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would fain have shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassander's Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made them as if he would pass over into Macedon: by which terror he forced Cassander to repair thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leaving many good Towns of Greece so weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to help themselves, if any foreign succour appeared. The aid which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenant of Antigonus, taking the advantage of Cassander's departure, entered the Country, drove his Garrisons out of divers Cities; forced the Governor of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; won the Cittadel of Thebes, and set the people at liberty. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before been raised out of her old ruins by the mere power of Cassander; of which act he was accused by Antigonus, as if it had been some heinous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the City, and the love of the Inhabitants, only by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men ready to thank the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to look forward upon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward upon their miserable nullity, that held them incapable of being any thing.

SECT. VI.

Victories of Ptolomy by Sea. A great Battle at Gaza, which Ptolomy and Seleucus won, against Demetrius the Son of Antigonus.

AS the presence or nearness of Antigonus gave life to his affairs in the lower Asia and Greece, so the designs of his enemies, taking advantage at his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Eastern parts, wherewith in the year preceding he had over-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wavered between contrary affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their covenant with Ptolomy, was visited by an Egyptian Fleet, wherewith Ptolomy, in his own person easily reduced them to a more settled order, putting some to death, carrying others away Prisoners, and leaving a Lieutenant of his own appointment, Governor of the whole Country. With the same Fleet he ran along the Sea-coasts, waiting a great part of Caria, Caria and Cilicia, with the spoils of which he enriched his followers, and returned loading to Cyprus. Demetrius the Son of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the success, wherewith his Father's subjects were oppressed, made all hast out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his hortes, and light-armed foot with him, because the business required expedition. But in vain did he tire himself and his followers, in halting seeking of ene, that by launching out into the deep, could in a few minutes decide the labour of so many days, if need had so required. Answerable to the vanity of this expedition was the success. For Ptolomy was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certain, whether having lightened his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, he would return upon those maritime Countries, or make towards Syria, where his coming was expected. He was indeed gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a Royal Army, which he levied with all convenient speed, for the recovery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore he was fain to chafe out of uncertainties the most likelihood, and return the way that he came, with all his companies, which were fitter for service in the open field, than to be belovied in Garrisons among the Cilicians. He had scarce refreshed his men and hortes in Syria, when the news arrived of Ptolomy's coming with a puissant Army, to give him battle. Hereupon he called to Council his principal friends, who advised him to give way to the time, and expect some better opportunity in the future, being a young man, and weakly furnished with means to resist such ancient and famous Generals, as Ptolomy and Seleucus. This counsel seemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of those aged men that gave it, than from any necessity growing out of the present business. For Demetrius considering himself to be the Son of Antigonus, and now General of his Father's Army, thought his own Title weight enough to be laid in balance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found he much reason that should move him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore persuading himself, that such odds of number, and of great fame, would rather serve to adorn the victory, than hinder him in obtaining it, he resolved to put the matter to Trial, without expecting the advantage of more help. So animating his Soldiers with hope of spoils and rewards, he abroad the coming of the enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soon as they had finished their wearisome journey over the Desarts of Arabia.

Ptolomy and Seleucus issuing out of so rich a Province as Egypt, came so well provided of all necessities, that their Army felt not any great grievance of the evil way, when battle was presented them, which conveniently they undertook. In all things else they had the odds of Demetrius; of Elephants they were utterly unprovided: But how to deal with those Beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kind of Palisado, fast and strongly together with chains, and sharpened in such a manner, that the Elephants could not seek to break upon it without receiving much hurt. The rest of their forces (which besides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate services, by them performed that year, whilst the enemies had wearied themselves, either with vain journeys, or long and dulling expectation) they disposed in such order, as best answered to the form, wherewith Demetrius was embattled. The fight began, and was maintained with equal courage, for a long time, each part striving more to win honour, than to satisfy any other passion, as having little cause of hatred or revenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who upon no necessity would needs fight a battle with disadvantage, began to appear by his losses. He had committed himself to Fortune, having more to lose by her than he could get: but in this fight he was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; unless it may be said, that the terror brought upon his men, by the loss of his Elephants was bad luck. Those beasts were in that kind of War hardly to be relied on plain ground; and therefore at the first they made great spoil amongst Ptolomy's men. Afterward seeking to break the Palisado, they were sorely hurt, and every one of them taken. This disaster caused the horsemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and prevailed little, till now perceiving that all must lie upon their hands, who were ill able to make their own places good, they began to shrink, and many of them to provide for their safety by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had driven so long in vain to make his men abide, that he himself was likely to be lost; he was fain to give place to the stronger, making a violent retreat as far as to Azotus, which was about thirty miles from the place of Battle. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his company turned aside, hoping to save such goods, as in haste they could pack up. This foolish covetousness was their destruction, and the loss of the Town. For, whilst they, forgetful of the danger, had filled the streets with tumult-horses, and cloyed up the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch others to carry out what they had already laden, Ptolomy's Army brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods, and the City altogether.

This Victory restored unto Ptolomy the best part of Syria, a Province more late in those times to get, than to keep; and opened the way unto all the greatness of Seleucus. For between Gaza and Phœnicia no place offered resistance. In Calabria and Phœnicia, some Towns held out a while, but were soon taken in by Ptolomy. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was given up by the Inhabitants; Tyrus by the Garrison, falling to mutiny against their Captain, who trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomy, and honourably entertained in respect of his fidelity.

SECT. VII.

How Seleucus recovered Babylon, and made himself Lord of many Countries in the highest Asia. The Era of the Kingdom of the Greeks, which began with the Dominion of Seleucus.

While Ptolemy followed his business with such prosperity, Seleucus took leave of him, and went up to Babylon to try his own fortunes which he found to be favourable, that recovering first his own Province, he became at length master of the better part of Alexander's purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of unlikelyhoods. His train consisted of no more than eighteen hundred foot, and two hundred horse, a number too small to have been placed as Garrison in some one of those main great Cities, against which he carried it into the highest Asia. But little force is needful, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found to good a Governour, that none of them would find courage to resist him; but left that work to Antigonus his own son, withing them ill to speed. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a Countenance of War, which by easy compulsion they left off, and followed new Engagements. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves joyfully to Seleucus. In a defence so general, it was not a fair course for the Antigonus, to thrust themselves into the Towns of most importance: for every man of them should have been troubled with daily enemies in his own lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and try the matter by fight. But the treason of one principal man, who revolted to the enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismayed the rest, that they did no more than seek to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his security in those quarters. This Castle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly took it; and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had belovied in Media and Persia, forces convenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the utmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his own great Army lay between them and all enemies. Therefore when the Victory at Gaza had opened unto Seleucus the way into those parts, he found little impediment in the rest of his business. Having now gotten what he fought, it behoved him to seek how he might keep his gettings: for his forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not do for him, his enemies did. Nicator, to whom Antigonus had committed his Army in Media, joyning unto himself, out of Persia and other Countries, all needful help, came, with ten thousand foot, and seven thousand Horse, either to save all from being lost, or to drive Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this power, Seleucus had only four hundred Horse, and somewhat above three thousand Foot, wherewith to oppose himself: his large Conquest of unwearlike Nations having yielded him many loving Subjects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were near to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himself from the place where his resistance was expected, into certain marshes not far off: where he lay secretly waiting for some advantage. Nicator thought that he had been fled, and was the less careful in fortifying his Camp. In recompence of this vain security, his Camp was taken by surprize, the first night of his arrival; the Satraps, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captains, were slain; he himself was driven to flee for his life into the Deserts, and the whole Army yielded unto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanor, after the Victory, drew all Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This Victory of Seleucus gave beginning unto the new stile of, The Kingdom of the Greek, an account much used by the Greeks, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first year of this Era. The authority of that great Astrologer Ptolemy, from which there is no appeal, makes it Pal. M. plain, that the five hundred and nineteenth year of mag. lib. Nabonassar, was the fourscore and second year of mag. lib. Seleucus. Other inference hereupon is needless, than that note of the learned Gauricus, that L. Caesar, the first of these years was reckoned complete, at Babylon, together with the end of four hundred thirty and eight years after Nabonassar. With the observation of the Saturn, recorded by Ptolemy agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the same Planet to have been placed in the sign of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had observed it, in the same year; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourscore and second year; and the last of the hundred thirty and seventh Olympiad. These observations of the celestial bodies, are the surest marks of time from which he that willfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in History, and the years of succeeding Princes (that are not seldom ambiguous, by reason of unremembered factions) if they seem to be here-again, it is not greatly material. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these years of the Greeks were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one year, that is found between actions, related by the several Authors of the new Books of the Maccabees, who follow divers accounts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolemy, may apply the other suppositions thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a years distance.

SECT.

SECT. VIII.

How Ptolemy lost all he won in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience performed unto the Macedonians, by those that had been subject unto the Persian Empire. Of divers petty enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius with ill success.

IN a happy hour did Seleucus adventure to go up to Babylon, with so few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he stayed longer upon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolemy could have spared him none at all. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, having lost the battle at Gaza, received from Ptolemy all his own goods, his Pages and Servants, in free gift, and therewithal a courteous discharge, to this effect: That no personal hatred was the ground of this War, which he and his confederates held with Antigonus; but only terms of honour, wherein they would seek to right themselves after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrel, should not be forgotten.

This noble dealing of Ptolemy, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire of requiting him, with some as brave liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troops; drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts, and advertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to lend a new supply, wherewith he might redeem his honour lost. Antigonus upon the first news of this overthrow, had said, That the victory which Ptolemy won upon a beardless Boy, should be taken from him by bearded men: yet lest after that his son, whom he tenderly loved, should amend his own reputation, he was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolemy hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did nevertheless follow his own business in Calogryia; thinking it enough to spend part of his Army under Ciles his Lieutenant, against the remnant of those, that had been already vanquished, when Ciles too much under-valued the power of such an Enemy. He thought that this young Gallant, having lately saved his life by flight, would now be more careful of having a fair way at his back, than adventurous in setting further forward, than urgent reason should provoke him. In this consideration he passed on without all fear; as one that was already Master of the field, and should meet with none, that would issue out of their places of strength to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this careless march; he took the lightest of his Army, and made his journey with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came upon Ciles unexpected, and was on the sudden, without any battle, Master of his Camp: taking him alive, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit served not only to repair the credit of Demetrius, which his loss at Gaza had much ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bounty of Ptolemy, with equal favour, in restoring to him Ciles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolemy so weakened by this loss, nor Demetrius so emboldened by his Victory, that any matter of consequence thereupon issued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptolemy; and therefore he fortified himself in places of advantage: Ptolemy on the other side was loth to engage himself in an enterprize, wherein he might perceive that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, he should either be driven to make a shameful retreat, or a dangerous adventure of his whole citate, in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus, indeed, was nothing slow in his way towards Syria; whether he made all haste, not so much to relieve his son as to embrace him. For he rejoiced exceedingly, that the young man had so well acquitted himself, and being left to his own advice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to encrease the reputation of this late Victory, he brought such forces, as might serve to re-conquer all Syria: meaning that the honour of all should be referred unto the good foundation laid by his son; whom from this time forwards, he employed in matters of greatest importance.

Ptolemy had now less reason to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to have assailed the Camp of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of consultation, as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captains advised him to retire into Egypt, alledging many good arguments to that purpose: which they might well perceive to be agreeable to his own intent, by his propounding that cause; not without remembrance of the good success against Perdiccas, in the like defensive War. So he departed out of Syria, preserving his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any sudden passion of fear: and he departed at fair leisure, not only carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to dismantle some principal Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Country that he left at his back, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easy was it in those times, for the Captain of a strong Army, to make himself Lord of a great Province.

We may justly wonder, that these Kingdoms of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations (which the victory of Alexander had over-run with so hasty a course, as gave him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not only by himself, but by the Captains of his Army after him. The hot contentions for superiority between the King of Israel, and those of Damascus; between Egypt and Babylon; Babylon and Ninus; the Persians and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to have once been in those people; which are now so patient of a foreign yoke, that like Sheep or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, fought for, won, lost, and again recovered by contentions Matters: as if they had no title to their own heads, but were born to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appear the more strange, if we shall consider, how the several States of Greece (many of which had never possessed so large a Dominion, as might cause their spirits to swell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occasions of liberty: and how these proud Conquerours were glad to offer it, desiring to have them rather than servants, for fear of further inconvenience.

It must therefore be noted that most of these Countries had always been subject unto the rule

SECT. VII.

How Seleucus recovered Babylon, and made himself Lord of many Countries in the highest Asia. The Persa of the Kingdom of the Greeks, which began with the Dominion of Seleucus.

While Ptolomy followed his business with such prosperity, Seleucus took leave of him, and went up to Babylon to try his own fortune; which he found to be favourable, that recovering still his own Province, he became at length master of the better part of Alexander's purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of unlikelyhoods. His train consisted of no more than eight hundred foot, and two hundred horse, a number too small to have been placed as Garrison in some one of those main great Cities, against which he carried it into the highest Asia. But little force is needed, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a Countenance of War, which by calm compulsion they left off, and followed new Engagements. This added courage to the people, who came in space, and submitted themselves joyfully to Seleucus. In a defection so general, it was not a fair cause for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Towns of most importance: for every man of them should have been troubled with daily enemies in his own lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and try the matter by fight. But the treason of one principal man, who revolted to the enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismayed the rest, that they did no more than seek to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his security in those quarters. This Cause, believe, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly took it; and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces convenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the utmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his own great Army lay between them and all enemies. Having now gotten what he fought, it behoved him to seek how he might keep his gettings: for his forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not do for him, his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Army in Media, joining unto himself, out of Persia and other Countries, all needful help, came, with ten thousand foot, and seven thousand Horse, either to save all from being lost, or to drive Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this power, Seleucus had only four hundred Horse, and somewhat above three thousand Foot, wherewith to oppose himself: his large Conquest of unwelcome Nations having yielded him many loving Subjects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were near to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himself from the place where his resistance was expected, into certain marshes not far off; where he lay secretly waiting for some advantage. Nicanor thought that he had been fled, and was the less careful in fortifying his Camp. In recompence of this vain security, his Camp was taken by surprise, the first night of his arrival; the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captains, were slain; he himself was driven to flee for his life into the Desarts, and the whole Army yielded unto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanor, after the Victory, drew all Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke or trickery.

This Victory of Seleucus gave beginning unto the new title of, The Kingdom of the Greeks, an account much used by the Greek, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long dispute about the first year of this Persa. The authority of that great Astrologer Ptolomy, from which there is no appeal, makes it Pto. Ant. plain, that the five hundred and nineteenth year of Nabonassar, was the five hundred and second year of Seleucus. Other inference hereupon is needless, than that note of the learned Gauricus, That the first of these years was reckoned complete, at Babylon, together with the end of four hundred thirty and eight years after Nabonassar. With the observation of the Saturn, recorded by Ptolomy agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Buning; finding the same Planet to have been placed in the sign of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had observed it, in the same year; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth, from Seleucus the four hundred and second year; and the last of the hundred thirty and seventh Olympiad. These observations of the celestial bodies, are the surest marks of time: from which he that willfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in History, and the years of succeeding Princes (that are not seldom ambiguous, by reason of unremembered factions) if they seem to be here-against, it is not greatly material. Yet thus much is worthy of note, that these years of the Greeks were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one year, that is found between additions, related by the several Authors of the two Books of the Maccabees, who follow divers accounts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomy, may apply the other suppositions thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a years distance.

SECT.

SECT. VIII.

How Ptolomy lost all he won in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience performed unto the Macedonians, by those that had been subject unto the Persian Empire, of divers party enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius with ill success.

In a happy hour did Seleucus adventure to go up to Babylon, with so few men as his friends could then well spare: for had he stayed longer upon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomy could have spared him none at all. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, having lost the battle at Gaza, received from Ptolomy all his own goods, his Pages and Servants, in free gift, and therewithal a courteous message, to this effect: That no personal hatred was the ground of this War, which he and his confederates held with Antigonus; but only terms of honour, wherein they would seek to right themselves after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrel, should not be forgotten.

This noble dealing of Ptolomy, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire of acquiring him, with some as brave liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troops, drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts, and advertising his Father of his misfortune, he begged him to send a new supply, wherewith he might redeem his honour lost. Antigonus upon the first news of this overthrow, had said: That the victory which Ptolomy won upon a beardless Boy, should be taken from him by bearded men: yet upon desire that his son, whom he tenderly loved, should amend his own reputation, he was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolomy hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did nevertheless follow his own business in Calycedonia, thinking it enough to spend part of his Army under Cilix his Lieutenant, against the remnant of those, that had been already vanquished, when Cilix too much under-valued the power of such an Enemy. He thought that this young Gallant, having lately favoured his life by flight, would now be more careful of having a fair way at his back, than adventurous in letting further forward, than urgent reason should provoke him. In this conscience he passed on without all fear; as one that was alone, that would issue out of their places of strength to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this careless march; he took the light of his Army, and made his journey with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came upon Cilix unexpected, and was on the sudden, without any battle, Master of his Camp: taking him alive, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit served not only to repair the credit of Demetrius, which his loss at Gaza had almost ruined; but further it enabled him, to recompence the bounty of Ptolomy, with equal favour, in restoring to him Cilix, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolomy so weakened by this loss, nor Demetrius so emboldened by his Victory, that any matter of consequence thereupon issued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptolomy; and therefore he fortified himself in places of advantage: Ptolomy on the other side was loath to engage himself in an enterprize, wherein he might perceive that if the coming of Antigonus went to his entangled, he should either be driven to make a shameful retreat, or a dangerous adventure of his life; which, in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus, indeed, was nothing slow in his way towards Syria; whither he made all haste, not so much to relieve his son as to embrace him. For he rejoiced exceedingly, that the young man had for so well acquitted himself, and being left to his own advice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to encrease the reputation of this late victory, he brought forth forces, as might serve to reconquer all Syria: meaning that the honour of all should be referred unto the good foundation laid by his son, whom from this time forwards, he employed in matters of greatest importance.

Ptolomy had now less reason to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to have assailed the Camp of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of consultation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captains advised him to retire into Egypt, alleging many good arguments to that purpose; which they might well perceive to be agreeable to his own intent, by his propounding that cause; not without remembrance of the good success against Ptolemæus, in the like defensive War. So he departed out of Syria, preserving his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any sudden passion of fear: and he departed at fair leisure, not only carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to dismantle some principal Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Country that he left at his back, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easy was it in those times, for the Captain of a strong Army, to make himself Lord of a great Province.

We may justly wonder, that these Kingdoms of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations (which the victory of Alexander had overrun with so hasty a course, as gave him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not only by himself, but by the Captains of his Army after him. The hot contentions for superiority between the King of Israel, and those of Danabur; between Egypt and Babylon; Babylon and Ninive; the Persians and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to have once been in those people; which are now so patient of a foreign yoke, that like Sheep or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, fought for, won, lost, and again recovered by contentious Masters: as if they had no title to their own heads, but were born to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appear the more strange, if we shall consider, how the several States of Greece (many of which had never possessed so large a Dominion, as might cause they to sit to swell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occasions of liberty: and how these proud Conquerors were glad to offer, desiring to have them rather friends than servants, for fear of further inconvenience.

rule of Kings, or petty Lords, whom the Babylonians and Perfians long since had rooted out, and held them in such bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of foreign Masters. This had utterly taken from them all remembrance of home-born Princes, and incorporated them into the great body of the Perfian Empire: so that wanting within themselves all sovereign power, or high authority, the life and spirit of every Estate, they lay as dead, and were bereaved of motion, when that Kingdom fell, whereof they lately had been members.

Why the Perfian Satraps, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captains after the death of Alexander, strive to lay hold upon those Provinces, which had many ages been subject unto them, and fence four years in quiet possession of their enemies; or why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did cease to fright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispossess them of their new purchases: it is a question, wherein who is not satisfied, may find no less reason to suspect the History, than authority to confirm it. For we seldom read, that any small Kingdom, prevailing against a far greater, hath made to entire a conquest in the compass of ten years, as left unto the vanquished no hope of recovery, nor means to rebel: especially when such disorders, or rather utter confusion hath ensued, by the fury of civil War among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Perfian Empire, is well set down by Machiavel, and concerns all other Kingdoms: that are subject unto the like form of Government: the sum whereof is this: Wherever the Prince doth hold all his Subjects under the condition of slaves, there is the conquest eate, and soon assured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to win all, and harder to keep that which is won. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdom of France. If any Invader should prevail so far upon Turkey, that the great Sultan and his Children (for Brethren he useth not to suffer alive) were taken or slain: the whole Empire would quickly be won, and easily kept, without any danger of Rebellion. For the Bassoos, how great soever they may seem, are meer slaves; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personal regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, wherein hope of private gain should not countervail, all apparent matter of fear. Contrariwise, in France, it was not enough for him that would make a Conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children: though he further got the better part of the Country, and were by far the strongest in the field.

For, besides the Princes of the Royal blood, there are in that Kingdom store of great men: who are mighty in their several Countries, and having certain Royalties and Principalties of their own, are able to raise War in all quarters of the Realm: whereunto the remembrance of their own ancient Families, and long continued Nobility, will always stir up and inflame them: so that until every one's piece were won, and every one (an endless work) of the chief Nobility brought under or destroyed, the victory were not complete, nor well assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobility, doth often times make way for an Invader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easily make a fair entrance.

But such assistants are not so easily kept, as they are gotten; for they look to be satisfied at full, in all their demands; and having what they would, they soon return to their old allegiance, upon condition to keep what they have, unless they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himself. The Turk on the other side, needs not to fear any peril, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principal men. The greatest mischief that any of them could work against him, were the betraying of some frontier Town, or the wilful loss of a battle: which done, the Traitor hath spent his fling, and must either flee to the enemy, whereby he loseth all that he formerly did hold; or else in hope of doing some further harm, he must adventure to excuse himself unto his Master, who seldom forgives the Captain, that hath not strived by desperate valour against misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so joyning themselves unto any Invader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them have any followers or dependents at all, other than such as are subject unto them, by virtue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principal men, doth leave unto them no means, whereby to oppose themselves, against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giving him assistance, if adversity should make him stand in need of them. For there is not scarce any one among the Turk's Bassoos, or Provincial Governors, that knows either from whence he was brought, or from whom defended, nor any one among them that by the loss and utter ruin of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foot of his proper inheritance; and it is the proper inheritance of the subject, which is also a Kingdom unto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conquerour, who hath no other device painted on his Ensign, than the picture of slavery.

As is the Turkish Empire, so was the Perfian, void of liberty in the Subjects, and utterly destitute of other Nobility, than such as depended upon mere favour of the Prince. Some indeed there were of the Royal blood, and others, descended from the Princes that joyined with Darius, the son of Hystaspes, in oppressing the Magi: these were men of reputation in Perfia, but their reputation consisted only in their Pedigree, and their safety in not meddling with affairs of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Perfian Princes were held, it may appear by this, that the King's Uncles, Cousin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and so did stile themselves, in speaking unto these great Monarchs. That upon every light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaves; it is easily to be discerned, in that example of cruelty, practised by Xerxes upon his own Brother Mastiues, which hath been formerly noted, in place more convenient. As for the Satraps, or Governors of the Provinces, it is needless to cite examples, proving them to have been meer slaves: it may suffice, that their heads were taken from them at the King's will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was governed.

To this want of Nobility in Perfia, may be added the general want of liberty convenient among the people, a matter no less avoidable, in making easy and sure the conquest of a Nation, than is is the cause alleged by Machiavel. For as Esop his Aes was not easy to run from his enemies, because it was not possible, that they should load him with heavier burthens, than his Master could him daily to bear: so the Nations, that endure the worst under their own Princes, are not greatly fearful of a foreign yoke: Nor will be hasty to shake it off, if by experience they find it more light, than was that, whereunto they had been long accustomed. This was it that made the Gassoians bear such faithful affection to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildly than the French. This enlarged the Venetian jurisdiction, in Lombardy; for the Towns that they won, they were out of the hands of Tyrannous oppressors: and this did cause the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had been subject unto the posterity of Alexander's followers, to serve the Romans patiently, if not willingly: for that by them they were eased of many burthens, which had been imposed upon them by their own Kings.

So that of this tameness, which we find in those that had been Subjects of the Perfian Kings, the reasons are apparent. Yet some of these there were, that could not so easily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeed been absolutely conquered by the Perfian. Such were the Sagadians, Badrarians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering upon Syria: against whom Antigonus sent part of his Army, thinking therewith to bring them under, or rather to get a rich booty. The Captains that he sent, fell upon the Nabatheans, at such time as they were buied in a great Mart; wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians for Mirrh, Frankincense, or other such commodities. All or most of these rich wares, together with five hundred Talents of silver, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold upon: for their coming was sudden and unexpected. But ere they could recover Syria, the Nabatheans overtook them, and finding them weary with long marches, made fable slaughter, that of four thousand foot, and six hundred horse, only fifty horse escaped. To revenge this loss, Demetrius was set out with a great power: yet all in vain; for he was not redified by any Army, but by the natural defence of a vast Wilderness, lack of water, and of all things necessary. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein he lost not much honour: for they craved it, and gave him presents. Returning from the Nabatheans, he viewed the Lake Alphaites, whence he conceived hope of great profit that might be raised, by gathering the Sulphur. With this good Husbandry of his Son, Antigonus was well pleased, and appointed men to the work: but they were slain by the Arabians, and so that hope vanished.

These petty enterprises, with the ill success accompanying them, had much impaired the good advantage against Polony: when the news of Selenus's victories in the high Countries, married all together. For neither was the loss of those great and wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it safe to transport the War into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria, and the lower Asia should have been exposed to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius with fifteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse, was sent against Selenus. These forces being sent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his Son did less.

Selenus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about

Babylon withdrew themselves from necessity of fight, some places they fortified and kept: Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without sitting in Garrison more men than he could spare, neither did he get much; and therefore, by burning and spoiling the Country: which he did thereby the more alienate, and, as it were acknowledge to be long unto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his own assured.

Antigonus had laid upon his Son a peremptory commandment, to return unto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seem) that in such an unsettled state of things, either the War might be ended, by the fury of the first brunt; or else it would be vain to strive against all difficulties likely to ensue, when want of necessities should frustrate the valour, that by strength of time was like to become less terrible to the enemy. Demetrius therefore leaving behind him five thousand foot, and a thousand horse, rather to make show of continuing the War, than to effect much, where himself with greater forces could do little more than nothing, forsook the enterprise and went back to his Father.

SECT. IX.

A general Peace made and broken. How all the house of Alexander was destroyed.

THESE ambitious heats, having thus wearied themselves with unfruitful travel, in seeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no private hatred, but meer desire of Empire, had moved them to enter into the War; so was it no friendly reconciliation, but only a dullness growing upon the slow advancement of their several hopes, that made them willing to breathe a while, till occasion might better serve to fight again.

Besides that main point, Of retaining the Provinces which every man held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gave a fair, but a false colour to the business; That the Son of Alexander by Roxane, should be made King when he came to full age; and, That all the Estates of Greece should be set at liberty. The advancement of young Alexander to his Father's Kingdom, seems to have been a matter forcibly extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discovered a purpose, to have made himself Lord of all. But this indeed, more nearly touched Cassander. For in his custody was the young Prince and his Mother: neither did he keep them in a fort answerable to their degree; but as close prisoners taken in that War, wherein they had been the old Queen Olympias taken and murdered, that fought to put them in possession of the Empire. The mutual hatred and fear between them, rooted in these grounds, of injuries done, and revenge expected; upon this conclusion of peace, grew up faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander: who saw the Macedonian turn their favourable expectation, towards the Son of their late renowned King.

All this either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The young Prince moit still have pollution of Macedonia: whereby Cassander shall be reduced to his poor office, of Captain over a thousand men, if not left in worse case. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either do as they had done under Ardenus; or better, as being acquainted with their own strength. He, in the mean time, by his readiness to acknowledge the true Heir, had freed himself from that ill-favoured imputation, of seeking to make himself Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like advantage had he in that Article, Of restoring the Greeks to their liberty. This liberty had hitherto been the subject of much idle discourse: but never took effect. Antigonus held scarce any Town of theirs, Cassander occupied most of the Country: which if he should let free, he must be a poor Prince: if not, there was matter enough of quarrel against him, as against a Disturber of the common Peace.

In the mean season, the Countries lying between Exphates and the Greek Seas, together with a great Army, and money enough to entertain a greater, might serve to hold up the credit of Antigonus, and to raise his hopes as high as ever they had been.

With much disadvantage do many men contend against one that is equal to them all in puissance. Cassander's friends had left him in an ill case: but he could not do without: for, where every man's help is necessary to the War, there may any one make his own peace: but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are weary. The best was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becoming Subjects unto any man, much less to the Son of an Asiatic woman, of whom they had long since refused to hear mention. Therefore he took a short course, and caused both the Child and his Mother to be slain: freeing thereby himself in a trice, from the dangerous necessity of yielding up his Government, which he must have done when the Child had come to Age. Roxane was a Lady of singular beauty, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdiccas desired to have her Son, being as yet unborn, proclaimed Heir to the great Alexander. Immediately upon the death of Alexander, he had used the favour (if it were not love) of Perdiccas, to the satisfying of her own bloody malice, upon Statira the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewise married, according to the custom of those Countries, wherein plurality of Wives is held no crime. For having by a counterfeit Letter, in Alexander's name, gotten this poor Lady into her hands, he did, by assistance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled up with earth. But now, by God's just vengeance, were the and her Son made away, in the like secret fashion: even at such time as the near approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment grow dearer unto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward show, as inwardly it was pleasing unto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords of all that they had under them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of War, wherein every one perfwaded himself of success, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Tymonachus and Selenus, that had work enough at home) began to rouse themselves: as if now the time were come, for each man to improve his own

Rock. Antigonus his Lieutenants were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: while their Master was careful in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the liberty of Greece: yet did the same argument minister unto Ptolemy matter of quarrel, against both him and Cassander, Ptolemy complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Towns, which ought, in fair dealing, to be set at liberty. Under colour of redressing this enormity, he sent an Army into Gilicia, where he won four Towns, and soon after lost them, without much labour of his own or his enemies.

After this, putting to Sea, with a strong Fleet, he ran along the Coast of Asia, winning many places: and in that Voyage allured unto him a Nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requital of his services) whom finding shortly, as false to himself as he had been to his own Uncle, he was fain to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greeks at liberty, appeared not so plain, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the love of that valiant Nation, he made at the last an Expedition into Greece itself: where having set free some little Islands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised so great an expectation of finishing the long-desired work, that Gratiola, the Widow of Alexander, Polyperchon's Son, gave up into his hands the Towns of Sicyon and Corinth.

Ptolemy had conceived a vain belief, that the Greeks, emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart and rise up in Arms; whereby with little labour their liberty might be gotten; and he be acknowledged as Author of this immortal benefit. But long servitude had well-near extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recover freedom, had so tired their spirits, that they would no more stir in pursuit thereof; but sat idly still, as willing it to fall into their mouths.

The Lacedemonians, about these times, began to fortify their Town with walls: trusting no longer in their virtue (for both it, and the Discipline that upheld it, were too much impaired) that had been a wall to their Town and Territory.

The Athenians were become as humble servants, as they had been insolent Masters: erecting as many statues in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, as there were days in the year. This Demetrius was now their Governor; and he governed them with much moderation: but, in spite of their hearts, as being set over them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principal Cities, it is easy to gather how the rest of the Country stood affected. Ptolemy could not get them to set for their helping hands to their own good, and to furnish him with the promised supplies of money and victuals. Credit is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thralldom; as judging the commodity that would arise by annexing them to his party, a matter of more weight than the loss that Cassander should receive thereby, who could hardly retain them, if once Antigonus took the work in hand. But when he found such difficulty in the business he changed his purpose: and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sicyon and Corinth in his own possession.

fander had been held occupied with very much work. For (besides his pains taken in Wars against barbarous Princes) he found means to allure unto himself the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: making his own advantage of their discontentments. By the like skillful practice he freed himself from a greater danger, and made these murderers which he had committed from the like odds, by teaching his enemies to do the same. Old Polyperchon, that had made to great a stir in the reign of Ardenus, did after the death of Roxane and her child, enter again upon the Stage: leading in his hand another Son of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Father's Throne.

The name of this young Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Basine the daughter of Artabazus a Persian; but had been less esteemed than the Son of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps, in regard of the favour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did bear unto Roxane. At this time the death of his Brother had moved such compassion, and the regard of his being Alexander's only living child, had procured unto him such regard, that the demand which Polyperchon made in his behalf, was deemed very just and honourable. There were indeed more hearts than hands, that joyed with this young Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him that least ought, had not been most false. Cassander had raised an Army to withstand his entry into Macedon: but little trust could he repose in that Army, whose willies he perceived to be with Hercules. Therefore he assailed Polyperchon himself with gifts and promises, and wherewith at length he prevailed so far, that the Old Villain was contented to murder his Pupil; chusing rather with many curses and foul dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus, and Commander of an Army; than to purchase a noble fame with dangerous travel, in maintaining his faith, unto both his dead and living Sovereigns.

Antigonus had not all this while been asleep; though his losses were hitherto the chief witnesses of his having been a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present to retain his own: And therefore took order for the recovery of those places which Ptolemy had taken partly to win. As for the rest, it no way grieved him to see Cassander incur the general hatred of men, by committing those murders of which the profit was like to redound unto him that was the most powerful, or to see Polyperchon and Ptolemy sweat in a busie War against Cassander. If they would have continued their quarrels, he could well have afforded them leisure, and have thought the time well spent in beholding their contentions. For he was thoroughly perfwaded, that when the rest had wearied themselves in vain with long strife, his Armies and Treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all under. According to these haughty conceits he demeaned himself among his followers, looking big upon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused to many of them to revolt from him: but it was no great loss to be forsaken by those that looked with envious eyes upon that fortune whereon their own should have depended. Against this envy of his men, and malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedy, such as was like to give him a goodly title to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra Sister unto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardis: whom he had great desire to take to wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howsoever the discovery of much unwillingness thereunto, yet was she in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for fear of being enforced. But it was not his purpose to get her by compulsive means: either because his fancy, being an old man, was not over-violent; or rather because his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could have made small use of her, by doing such apparent wrong. She had been married unto Alexander King of Epirus, after whose death she came to her Brother in Asia; hoping belike to find a new Husband in his Camp. But neither any of those brave Captains, that were, in times following to hot in love with her, durst then aspire unto her marriage: nor did her Brother, full of other cares, trouble himself with providing her of an Husband. She therefore, being a lusty widow, suffered her blood so far to prevail against her honour, that she supplied the want of an Husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a Jest: saying, That she was his Sister, and must be allowed this liberty, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death the Empire lay in a manner void, and the portion due to her therein grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had been: then did many seek to obtain her, while the her self desired only a proper man, with whom the might lead a merry life. To this purpose did the ivyite Leontas unto her; who made great haste, but was cut off by death ere he came to her preference. Now at the last, after long tarrying, she had her choice of all the great Commanders, Antigonus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus and Cassander, being all her earnest Wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had Wives already: Ptolemy had many Wives, and many Concubines whom he respected as much as his Wives, being noted of too much dotage in that kind. This hindered not his suit: peradventure it advanced it, by giving to Cleopatra some hope of mutual toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her self, and was taking her journey from Sardis towards him; when Antigonus his Deputy in that City, made her to stay, until his Master's further pleasure should be known. Antigonus had now a Wolf by the ears: he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her go. She would not be his Wife; he had no honest pretence to force her; and to keep her prisoner, had been the way, by which he might have incurred a general hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the cause taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Lady less respected than Alexander's own Sister) did well testify. Therefore he thought it the wisest way to procure her death: for to let any other enjoy the commodity of so fair a Title to the Kingdom, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Governour of Sardis, willing him in any case to do it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certain women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death as mischievous conspirators against the life of that good Lady. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least in his own opinion: but the world was less foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murder was detected, we need not ask: for seldom is that bloody crime unrevealed, and never so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought upon nothing less than the execution of God's justice, due unto the cruelty of these powerful, but mercilefs Princes. Wherefore the ambitious flames, erected by these Tyrants, upon so wicked foundations of innocent blood, were soon after cast down, overwhelming themselves or their children, with the ruins, as the sequel will declare.

SECT. X.

How Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, gave liberty to Athens, expelling the Garrisons of Callander out of those parts. The immoderate honour decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

None being left alive that had any title to the Kingdom; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superior, should freely proffer themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill-belcomed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbear: neither seemed it convenient in the judgement of Antigonus, to crown his last action with such a title, as he had attained unto greatness by that foul murder, the infamy whereof he was careful how to discharge from his own head. He purposed therefore to undertake a plausible enterprise, even the liberty of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honour as would not only drown all bad reports, but make him be thought equal to any name of Royalty, whereof in seeming modesty, he was not covetous. To this purpose he delivered a strong Army, with a Navy of two hundred and fifty sail, and fifty thousand talents of Silver, unto Demetrius his son: willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceed, in letting the Country free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance he entered the Haven; it being thought that a Fleet of Polomy, Callander's good friend, had been arrived. But when it was known, both who he was, and what was the cause of his coming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations: Demetrius Philareus forsook the Town, and withdrew himself to Thebes under safe conduct; only the Garrison in Munychia strove to make good that piece, which after a while was won upon them by force. During the siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Callander, and so restored the City to liberty.

I think it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seem no better than meer trifles: for even by trifles are the qualities of great persons as well disclosed, as by their great actions, because in matters of importance, they commonly strain themselves, to the observance of general commended rules; in the lesser things they follow the current of their own Natures. The Lady Cratippida lay in Petroe, and had a great desire to see Demetrius; hoping, belike, that he might by his means better her estate, and recover her

Towns of Sycon and Corinthus, detained by Polomy to whose Lieutenant in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered money for the surrender of them. Yet the only business pretended was love. He being advertised thereof, left his forces in the Country of Megara, and taking a company of his lightest armed, for guard of his person, made a long journey to meet with her. This troop also he caused to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might see her when she came. As closely as the business was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceived good hope, that the diligence of a very few men might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any terms of reason, by taking his dear son prisoner. Their project fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddenly upon him, that he had no better shift, than to muffle himself in an old cloak, and creep away disguised; leaving them to ransack his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medley of conditions; especially an extreme dissoluteness in wanton pleasures, and a painful industry in matters of War. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in devising Engines of War, and curious in working them with his own hands. He knew better how to reform his bad fortune, than how to rule his good. For adversity made his valour more active: prosperity puffed him with over-weening, wherein he thought that he might do what he liked. His fortune was changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her Wheel, till she had wound up the thread of his life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Camp, and finishing his business at Megara; he resolved no longer to attend the issue of a siege, to assail Munychia by force, that so he might accomplish the liberty of Athens: which, until it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the City. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through help of their Engines that scoured the walls, prevailed upon the resolution of those that lay within it, and won the place in two days. The walls, and all the defences of that piece against the City, were levelled with the ground, and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom it was given their liberty, with promise to aid them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowlier, than of any other victory gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industry. For the Athenians, having forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make up that defect with their tongues: converting to base flattery, that eloquence of theirs which the virtues of their Ancestors had suited unto more manly arguments.

They decreed unto Antigonus and Demetrius the name of Kings; they consecrated the place in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entered their City, and built there an Altar, calling it of Demetrius. The Athenians, they called them by the names of the gods their forefathers, ordaining that every year, there should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Ambassadors, but Theoroi, or consultants with the gods: like as they were, whom they sent unto the Oracle of Jupiter, or Apollon.

It

It were a frivolous diligence to rehearse all their flatteries, these being too gross. Hurry they not only corrupted the young Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would have pleased the old man, to be of no use. For he could not handsomely take upon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians, unless he would seem to approve their vanity, in loading them with more than humane honours. Yet was he so tickled with this their fine handling him, that when their Theoroi or Consultants came shortly after, desiring him to relieve them with Corn and Timber to build ships; he gave them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather too weak is great power in resisting the assaults of flattery.

SECT. XI.

The great victory of Demetrius against Polomy in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius took upon them the stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

From this glorious work, Antigonus called away Demetrius, unto a business of greater difficulty: meaning to employ his service against Polomy in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to establish a General Council, that should treat of matters concerning the common good of the Country. About the same time Antigonus withdrew his own Garrison out of Inchros, committing their liberty again, into the peoples hands; whereby it might appear, that as he would not permit any other to oppress the Greeks, so would he be far from doing it himself. This was enough to hold his reputation high, among these new purchased Friends: it followed, that he should convert his forces, to the winning of ground upon his Enemies.

A pitiful Tragedy had lately happened in Cyprus, through the indifference of Menelaus, Polomies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Isle. Nicoles, King of Paphos, was entered into some practice with Antigonus; yet not so far that he thought himself past excuse, by which confidence, he was perhaps the more easily detected. To cut off this negotiation, and the false-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was sent thither: who surrounded Nicoles his house with Soldiers, required, in Polomies name, to have him yielded to the death. Nicoles offered to clear himself; but Menelaus told him, that dye he must, and bad him come forth quietly. This desperate necessity caused the unhappy King to rid himself of life: and his death struck such an impression into his wife, that he not only drew her self, but persuaded the wives of her husband's brethren to do the like. Altho those brethren of Nicoles, unto whom Polomy had intended no ill, being amazed with the suddenness of this calamity, did shut the Palace, and flinging it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

Whatsoever the crime objected was; Nicoles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this sad accident, though Menelaus deserved the blame, for his rigorous proceedings, yet it is to be thought, that much dislike fell also upon Polomy: as men that are grieved, cast an ill affection even upon those that gave the further removal occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Polomy was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing against him, either because they had small strength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not have the rule of their own Country. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Army, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driven to leave his wife within the walls of Salamis, where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong succour, he had no likelihood to make good the place, much less to retain possession of the whole Island. His greatest help at the present was the fidelity of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could win from him, nor good usage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and enrolled in the enemies bands) keep from returning to him, with the first opportunity. Most of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Egypt, which was enough to keep them faithful. Yet could not this their resolution have stood long against the odds of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of battery, if Polomy had not halted to the rescue.

Polomy brought with him a hundred and forty Gallies, besides two hundred Ships of burthen, for transporting his Army and Carriages. This Fleet made a terrible cheer, when it was described afar; though more than half of it was unfit for service in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadful, Polomy sent unto Demetrius a threatening message: willing him to be gone, unless he would be over-welcomed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this young gallant repaid him with words of as much bravery, promising to let him escape upon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Sycon and Corinthus.

Demetrius had no more than one hundred and eighteen Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Polomy; better stored with weapons fit for that service; and very well furnished in the prow, to beat upon the enemy. Nevertheless he stood in great doubt of these Gallies that lay in the Haven of Salamis, lest Menelaus with them should set upon his back: in which case, it was very likely that all would go very ill with him. Against this mischief he bestowed ten of his own Gallies in the mouth of that Haven, to keep Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his horsemen on the shore, to give what assistance they could, with the rest of the Fleet, unto to Sea against Polomy.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtful success. The generals were not ranged opposite one to the other, but held each of them the left wing of his own Fleet. Each of them prevailed against the squadron wherewith he encountered, but the success of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victory in one part was such, as could others to fall out of order, and finally drove all to betake themselves unto speedy flight. As for Polomy, he was fain to leave his advantage upon the enemy in one part of the fight, that he might relieve and animate those those of his own which needed him in another : wherein he found his loss over-great to be repaired ; by contending any longer against the fortune of that day ; and therefore he laboured only to save himself, in hope of better event, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battle no unusual accident ; yet was the victory greater than could have been expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the skill in Sea-services, which the Greeks and Phoenicians that were with Demetrius, had above those which followed Ptolemy : partly, the good furniture of the Ships, wherein consisted no less, than in the quality of those with whom they were manned. Further, we may reasonably judge, that the two hundred Ships of barthen, carrying the strength of Ptolemy's Army, did not more encourage his men, and terrify his enemies the day before the fight, than breed in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the night they fell off, and stood aloof. For though it were fitting that they should do so, yet a multitude, prepossessed with vain conceits, will commonly apprehend very flight occasions to think themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation that Menelaus, issuing with his Fleet out of Salamis should charge the enemy in the stern, was utterly frustrate. He was kept in perforce, by the ten Ships appointed to bar up the mouth of the Haven ; which they manly performed, as great necessity required.

Such disappointment of expectation doth much abate the courage of men in fight : especially of the assailants ; whereas on the contrary they finding that some part of their fears are vain, do easily gather hopeful spirits, and conceive an opinion of their own ability, to do more than they thought upon, out of their not suffering the harm that they had imagined.

Whatever the causes of this victory were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolemy had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight : all the rest of his Fleet was either taken or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer thrive against the violence of fortunes ; but yielded up all that he held in Cyprus, together with his Army, consisting of twelve thousand foot, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the Haven of Salamis. The same dejection of spirit was found in the common Soldiers, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had served the Egyptian by Land ; none of them repaying any more confidence in Ptolemy, but willingly becoming followers of a new Lord, whose Army they now increased.

It was generally believed, that much more depended on the event of this fight, than the life of Cyprus, for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great ; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking every day a year, till he was advertised of the issue. In this mood Antistodemus found him, a noble flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured with the Message of these good news. Antistodemus had betrothed himself of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his joyful errand : He caused his Ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore ; he himself landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately back to the Ship, and so all alone went forward, looking very sadly, that no part of his tidings might appear in his countenance. Report of his arrival (for it was known where he had been) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after Messenger to meet him on the way, and bring speedily word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much of a look, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be won from this demure Gentleman. Thus marched he fair and lustily forward with a great throng at his heels (that served well to set out his Pageant) until he came in sight of Antigonus, who could not contain himself, but went down to meet him at the Gate, and heard the news. Then did Antistodemus, upon the sudden, with a high voice salute Antigonus by the name of King ; uttering the greatness of the victory (with as much pomp, as before he had covered it, with silence) in the hearing of all the people ; who with loud acclamations, gave that name of King, both to Antigonus and his son Demetrius. Antigonus, in requital of his long suquence, wherein Antistodemus had held him, said, That it should also be long ere he received his reward. But the Title of King, together with the Diadem, which his friends did set on his head, he could not with a fairer occasion to assume : wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his son.

When it was once noised a broad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselves Kings ; it was not long ere their fellows were ready to follow the good example. Ptolemy his friends would by no means endure, that their Lord should be thought a man dejected for the loss of a Fleet ; therefore they salute him also King. Lysimachus in Thrace had boldness enough to put a Diadem about his own head. Selenus had, before this time, among the barbarous people, taken upon him as King ; but now he used the title indifferently, as well among the Greeks and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himself contented with his own name : whereby, howsoever he might shadow his pride, he no way lessened the fame of his cruelty against his Master's house. But the name which he forbore, his sons after him were bold to usurp, though with ill success, as will appear when they shall enter upon the Stage, whereon these old Tragedians, under new habits, as no longer now the same persons, begin to play their parts, with bigger looks, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and judgement, than in the Scenes already past.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Wars between the Kings of Egypt, Asia, Macedon, Thrace, and others ; until all Alexander's Princes were consumed.

SECT. I.

The Expedition of Antigonus against Egypt, with ill success.

ALl the rest of these Kings had taken that name upon them, in imitation of Antigonus himself, as becoming his greatness : which was such as gave him hope to swallow them up, together with their new Titles. Being not ignorant of his own strength, he resolved to single out Ptolemy, and make him an example to others : who should hardly be able to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose he prepared an Army of eighteen thousand foot, and eight thousand Horse, with fourscore and three Elephants : as likewise a Fleet of an hundred and fifty Gallies, and a hundred ships of burthen. The Land forces he commanded in person : of the Navy Demetrius was Admiral.

When all was ready for the journey, the Seamen advised him to stay yet eight days longer, and expect the coming of the Pleiadæ. But his hasty desire to prevent all preparations for resistance that Ptolemy should make, rejected this counsel ; imputing it rather to their fear than skill : wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Town which he had built in Syria, and called after his own name, that was soon changed into Selenucia, by his mortal enemy) and came to Gaza, where he met with his Fleet. The nearer that he drew to Egypt, the more hast he made : thinking by celerity to prevail more than by his great power. He caused his Soldiers to carry ten days provision of victuals ; and had many Camels laden with all necessities for passing over the Deserts, over which he marched with no small toil, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Gassius, which is near adjoining to Nilus, he saw his Fleet riding at Anchor, not far from the shore, in ill case, and many Ships wanting. It had been forely beaten with foul weather, wherein some were lost, others driven back to Gaza, or scattered elsewhere into such creeks as they could recover : Demetrius himself, with the best and strongest Vessels, did so long beat it up against the Wind, that all his fresh water was spent ; in which extremity, he and all his must have perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in sight, from whom those over-wearied, thirsty and Sea-beaten Soldiers received relief. After these painful travels, there followed a War no less painful than to little purpose : for Ptolemy had fortified all the passages upon the River of Nilus, as he assured himself either to end the war there, or if his guards should happen to be forced, yet could it not be done but so much to the weakening of the Assailants, as he should afterwards, with a second Army (which he held entire) entertain the Invader upon advantage enough. All that Antigonus fought, was to come to blows speedily : Ptolemy on the contrary, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gave him water enough, but wood he had none to warm it : and while Antigonus assaulted the Rampiers, raised upon the River, in vain, Ptolemy stayed the faith of his Soldiers, with good success ; for, with great gifts, and greater promises, he ferried them over so fast, as had not Antigonus thrust some assured Regiments upon the passages next the enemy, and in the mean while taken a resolution to return, Ptolemy had turned him out of Egypt ill attended.

Some of them indeed he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those he put to death with extreme torments ; but in all likelihood with the same ill success that Perdiccas had formerly done, when he invaded Egypt, had he not readily removed his Army further off, from the noise of their entertainment, that had already been won from him. To prevent therefore as well the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a forced retreat, he secretly practised the advice of his Council, upon whom the burthen must be laid of his entrance, and leaving Egypt.

It is indeed less prejudicial in such like cases, that errors, dishonours and losses, be laid on Counsellors and Captains, than on Kings ; on the Directed, than on the Directors : for the honour and reputation of a Prince is far more precious than that of a Vassal. Charles the fifth, as many other Princes have done, laid the loss and dishonour he received in the invasion of France, by the way of Provence to Antony de Leva, whether justly or no, I know not ; but howsoever, all the Historians of that time agree, that the sorrow thereof cost that brave Captain his life. Certainly to give any violent advice in doubtful enterprises, is rather a testimony of love, than of wisdom, in the giver ; for the ill success is always cast upon the Counsel, the good never wants a Father, though a false one, to acknowledge it. Yet I have sometime known it, that great Commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, have not only been disswaded, but held, in a kind, by strong hand, from hazarding their own persons, and yet have those kind of Mutiniers never been called to a Marshal's Court.

SECT. II.

How the City of Rhodes was besieged by Demetrius.

His departure of Antigonus, left behind it many dead Caracass, and a great deal of joy in Egypt. Ptolemy held a solemn Fast, and sent Messengers abroad, laden with glad news to Seleucus, Lysimachus, and Cassander, his Confederates: triumphing all that side, with the report of his late victory, though it appeared but in a defensive War. Antigonus on the contrary, flattered himself with another interpretation, calling the joys of his enemies for witnesses of his own greatness, seeing they arose but from so little things: his enemies being but bare favours by the late bargain, and himself, as he supposed, having lost but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retreat. Howsoever it were, yet he meant to follow his affairs henceforth in another fashion: for that which he could not cleave asunder by great blows, he purposed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches first, to tell the Tree it self with the monarchy. To effect which, he resolved (having the great ones to grow a while), to root up the Dependents of his enemies: Dependents, whom the fore-named Confederates should be forced either to relieve, or to lose; and hereby he doubted not to draw them into the field, where the advantage of power, and of all other warlike provision promised him victory.

At this time the City of Rhodes was very mighty being well governed, and having long held it self in good Neutrality; it drew the better part of all the Trade of those parts, and therein a great deal of riches to it self; to maintain which, and to enlarge it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed Ships, by which it not only beat off all Pirates and petty Thieves, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the Neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacy.

In this so dangerous a time (in which they must either refuse all that fought them, and so stand friends and apart; or join themselves to some one, and thereby forego the peace, by which their greatness had grown their affections carried them to the Egyptian: both because the greater part of their Trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus, his disposition, greatness, and neighbourhood, was fearful unto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages more apparent, gave argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himself against them by petty injuries, taking some of their ships, with such other grievances, while he made a more weighty preparation, to pursue the War against them openly and strongly. All things soon after ordered according to the greatness of the enterprise, he employed his Son Demetrius against them in their own Island, who brought such terror upon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their assistance and service against whomsoever Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perswaded by fear, and not by love; raised his demands to an intolerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be delivered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many ships of War as himself pleased.

These conditions, more properly to be imposed upon a State already conquered, than on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained assistance, resorted unto the Rhodians their lost courage, and made them resolve to defend their liberty to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bondmen, and wisely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselves fellow-slaves with them.

Demetrius having refused the fair conditions offered (as the Rhodians, the fearful ones prolonged unto them) make preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carry the place in future, he set in hand with his engines of battery; in the invention and use of which, he did never think himself a greater Artisan, than in this War. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults given them for a whole year, after many brave sallies out of the Town, and the famine which they endured within the Town, which had proved far more extrem, if Ptolemy had not with many hazards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Ambassadors, gave over the siege: a hundred hostages they gave him for performance of the Peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and Officers of the City.

Henceunto Demetrius was brought by the usual policy of War, and State: for while with the flower of all his Father's forces he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from his; neither did Cassander make the War as in former times, by practice and surprise, but by a strong and well compounded Army, which he himself led as far as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed and endangered Athen itself. On the other side (though with less success) did Polyperchon invade Peloponnesus. These dangerous undertakings upon Greece, advised the Athenians and Ætolians to dispatch their Ambassadors towards Demetrius, and advised Demetrius rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten by setting all Greece at liberty.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Island, than that the Rhodians erected Statues in honour of Lysimachus and Cassander; but for Ptolemy, whom they most affected, and from whom they received their most relief, they consulted with the Oracle of Jupiter, whether it were not lawful to call him a god. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hammou, gave the same far answer for Ptolemy, which they had formerly done for Alexander's Masters; for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Army at his heels, so was Ptolemy at this time Lord of the soil: and yet was this a far more cleanly creation than that done by the Athenians, who deified Antigonus and Demetrius by decree of the people. A mad age it was, when so many of Alexander's Captains, could not content themselves with the title of Kings, but that they would needs be called gods.

SECT.

SECT. III.

How Demetrius prevailed in Greece. Cassander desires peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtain it. Great preparations of War against Antigonus.

Demetrius, coming with a strong Fleet and Army into Greece, quickly drove Cassander out of Attica, and pursuing his fortune, chased him beyond the Straits of Thermopylae. Herein his reputation did much avail him; which was to great, that six thousand of his enemies soon revolted unto him. So, partly by the greatness of his name, partly by force, he recovered in short space all that Cassander held in those Straits, and giving liberty unto the people, he bestowed upon the Athenians those pieces, which had been fortified against them, to block them up. Then went he into Peloponnesus, where he found the like or more easie success: for he suddenly took Argos, Corinth, Syeion, and the most of the Country, bestowing liberty upon such as needed it. The Town of Syeion was translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old seat into another place, and called it after his own name, Demetrius. This done, he betook himself to his pleasure. At the Libanians games he caused himself to be proclaimed Captain General of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he deified all others, making it a matter of jest, that any, save himself or his Father, should usurp the Name of King. But in his behaviour he was so far unlike to a King, that in all the time of his leisure, he deserved none other name than of a drunken Pallid and. Yet were the Albanians as ready as ever to devise new honours for him: among which they made one Decree, That whatsoever King Demetrius should command, ought to be held sacred with the gods, and just with men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great fear, lest the War should fall heavily upon him in Macedon: which to avoid, he knew no better way than to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpose he sent Ambassadors; but had no better answer from Antigonus, than that he should submit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him look about him, and labour hard in soliciting his friends, both to assist him, and take heed to themselves: neither found he them slow in apprehending the common danger: for Lysimachus knew that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soon be Master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolemy and Seleucus ignorant of that which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himself in quiet possession of those Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with joint forces they should all together set upon the common enemy.

Henceof Antigonus had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saying, That he would as easily scatter them, as a flock of birds are driven away with a Stone. With these conceits he pleased himself, and no way hindered the proceedings of his Enemy. He lay at that time in the Town of Antigonia (a name that it must shortly lose) where he was carefully providing to set out some state ly games and Pageants, in ostentation of his glory. But thither was brought unto him the tumultuous news of Lysimachus his victories about Hellepontus. For Cassander had committed unto Lysimachus part of his forces, wherewith to pass over into Asia, while he himself with the rest, should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus palling the Hellepontus, began to make hot war upon the Subjects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to join with him by fair means, winning others by force, and wasting the Country round about.

To repress this unexpected boldness, Antigonus made hasty journeys, and came soon enough to recover his losses, but not strong enough to drive Lysimachus home, or compel him to come to battle. Lysimachus waited for the coming of Seleucus; keeping himself the whilst from necessity of fighting. But Babylon was far off, and Seleucus his preparations were too great to be soon in a readiness. The Winter also did hinder his Journey: which informed them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrel in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspense, and bred much expectation. Yet might all have come to nothing, had not Antigonus been so froward, that he refused to yield upon any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew near with a mighty Army of his own (for he had gathered strength in that long time of leisure, which Antigonus had given him) and with great aid from Ptolemy, that was joyed with his forces.

To help in this needful case, Demetrius was called over into Asia by his Father's letters: which he readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, upon reasonable terms: to the end he might not be driven to leave any part of his Army for defence of the Country; and that his journey might be without any such blemish of reputation, as if he had abandoned his Dependents: for one Article of the peace was, that all the Cities of Greece should be at liberty. Cassander was glad to be so rid of an enemy that was too strong for him. Yet would this league have done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise than they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred unto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, every one found means to clear himself of all incumbrances elsewhere, to the end that each of them might freely apply himself to the trial of the main controversy in Asia.

SECT. IV.

How Antigonus was slain in a great battle at Ipsus, near unto Ephesus; wherein his whole estate was lost.

Seleucus, with his Son Antiochus, joining with Lysimachus, compounded a great Army, which was (all considered) not inferior to that of the Enemy. In greatness of name (that helpeth much in all Wars, but especially in the Civil) they were rather unanswerable than unequal to their Adversaries: for Antigonus had of a long time kept them under with a mauling spirit, and had been repented a King indeed, when the rest were held but Usurpers of the Title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brave Commander, mander, having given proof of his worth in many great services at all kinds, and enriched the art of War with many inventions, which even his enemies, and particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Selenus, who had sometimes flattered Antigonus, and feaſtly ſtoſt him away from him to ſave his life, with young Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this journey; and Lysimachus, that had lived long in a corner, hardly keeping his own from the wild Thracians; wanted much in reputation of that which was yielded to their oppoſites: yet fo, that as ancient Captains under Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough to receive any benefit that Fortune might give, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Soldiers, on both ſides, were for the moſt part hardly and well exerciſed: many of them having ſerved under Alexander; though of thoſe old Companies, the long ſpace of two and twenty years had confirmed the greateſt number. But concerning their affections, the followers of Selenus were either perſwaded, that in this battle they muſt either get the upper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged unto the Confederate Princes; whereas Antigonus his men could diſcern no other neceſſity of fighting, than the obſtinate quality of their Lord, that needs would be Maſter of all. Antigonus had about threeſcore and ten thouſand foot, ten thouſand horſe, and threeſcore and fifteen Elephants. His enemies were fix thouſand horſe of him in number of their foot; in horſe they had the odds of five hundred; of Elephants they had four hundred, and an hundred and twenty armed Chariots of War: which helps, though they little had availed the Perſians, yet were they not to be deſpiſed, in the hands of a good Captain.

Antigonus himſelf, either troubled with the unexpected greateſts of his enemies forces, or preſaging little good like to enſue, grew very penſive, communing much in private with his Son whom he commended to the Army as his Succedor: whereas in former times he had never been ſo joind, as towards the hour of battle, nor had been accuſtomed to make his Son, or any other private to his council, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad luck, either foregoing the fight, or afterwards deſired, I hold it needleſs to recount. Diana of Ephesus dwelt near to the place of battle, a buſie goddeſs in many great lights: and therefore likely to have been thruſt into the ſcale, if any matter nearly reſembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is caſie to believe, that theſe two ſo gallant Armies, containing well near all the ſtrength of Alexander's whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by ſuch worthy Commanders, and whom the iſſue thereof did highly concern. Yet are few of the particulars recorded: an eaſie loſs in regard of the much variety, wherewith every ſtory abounds in this kind. The moſt memorable things in the battle, were theſe: Demetrius with his beſt force of Horſe, charged valiantly upon young Antiochus; whom when he had broken and put to flight, he was ſo tranſported with the heat of his good ſucces, that he never gave over his purſuit, but left his Father naked, and loſt thereby both him, and the victory. For when Selenus perceived this advantage, he interpoſed his Elephants, between Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus; and with many troops of horſe offered to break upon the enemies battle, whereſoever it lay moſt open, he did ſo terrible the Antigonus, that a great part of them rather choſe to revolt from their Lord, whilst they were fairly invited, than to ſuſtain the fury of ſo dangerous an impreſſion. This cowardize, or rather Treafon of ſome, diſcouraged others; and finally, caſt them all into flight; expoſing their General to the laſt end of his deſtines. Antigonus was then fourſcore years old, very fat, and unwieldy, ſo that he was unapt for flight, if his high ſpirit could have entertained any thought thereof. He had about him ſome of his moſt truſty followers, and as many others as he could hold together. When that he perceived a great troop making towards his perſon, told him, Sir King, your company means to charge you: He answered, Well may they, for who defends me? but anon Demetrius will relieve us. Thus expecting to the very laſt, that his Son ſhould come to the reſcue, he received ſo many Darts into his body, as took away his lately ambitious, but then fearful hopes, together with his troubleſome life.

His great ability in matter of Arms, together with his unſatiable deſire of Empire, have ſufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his Actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loved by his friends; as one that could not moderate his Fortune, but uſed inſolence toward all alike, as if it had been ſome virtue neareſt repreſenting a Kingly Maſteſty. This was the cauſe that ſo many of his followers revolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Army forſook him in his laſt neceſſity. For thoſe Kings and Princes that call all the careful endeavours of their Vaffals, only duty and debt; and are more apt to puniſh the leaſt offences, than to reward the greateſt ſervices; ſhall find themſelves upon the firſt change of fortune (ſeeing it is love only that ſtays by adveſtity) not only the moſt friendsleſs, but even the moſt contemptible, and deſpised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he lived; in part he left it to be verified upon his Son.

SECT. V.

How Demetrius, forſaken by the Athenians after his overthrow, was reconciled to Seleucus and Ptolomy, beginning a new fortune, and ſhortly enſuing into quarrels.

FOR Demetrius, at his return from the idle purſuit of young Antiochus, finding all quite loſt, he was glad to ſave himſelf, with four thouſand horſe, and five thouſand foot, by a ſpeedy retreat unto Ephesus, whence he made great haſt unto Athens, as to the place, that for his ſake would ſuffer a ny extremity. But whilst he was in the midſt of his courſe thither, the Athenian Ambaſſadors met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings ſhould be admitted into their City. Theſe were Ambaſſadors, not Theori, or Conſulters with the Oracle. It was a ſhameleſs ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his miſery, with ſuch a decree: neither did any part of his calamity more afflict the unfortunate Prince, than to ſee his adveſtity deſpised by thoſe whom he had thought his ſuſt reſt Friends. Yet was he ſain to give good words. For he had left many of his Ships in their Haven, of which he now ſtood in great need; and therefore was ſain to ſpeak them fair, that ſometimes had groſly flattered him. But he ſhall live to teach them their old language, and ſpeak unto them in another tune. When he had gotten his Ships, he failed to the Iſthmus, where he found nothing but matter of diſcomfort. His Garrifons were every where broken up; the Soldiers having betaken themſelves to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a ſmall Army and Fleet, without money or means wherewith to ſuſtain him and his followers any long time. All the reſt, or the greateſt part of his Father's Dominion, was now in dividing among the Conquerors, and thoſe few places which as yet held for him (having not perchance heard the word of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieve: for to put himſelf into the field on that ſide of the Sea, he had no powers, and to incloſe himſelf in any of them, how ſtrong ſoever, were but to imprifon his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeed to bury himſelf and his eſtate: He therefore creeping thorow thoſe buſhes that had feweſt briers, fell upon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdom, whereof he gave all the ſpoil that was gotten, to his Soldiers; his own loſſes having been too great to be repayed again by ſmall prizes.

In the mean while the Confederate Princes had wherewithal to buſie themſelves, in the partition of thoſe Provinces, of which their late victory had made them Lords: wherein Selenus had a notable advantage by being preſent, and Maſter of the field; for neither Ptolomy nor Caffander were at the overthrow given, having only ſent certain troops to re-inforce the Army which Selenus led, who took hold of a part of Aſia the leſs, and all Syria, being no otherwiſe divided from his own Territory, than by the River of Euphrates. For there had not any order been taken by the Confederates, for the division of all thoſe Lands: becauſe they did not expect ſo proſperous an iſſue of that War, which they made only in their common defence. It was therefore lawful for Selenus, to make the beſt benefit that he could of the Victory, at which nevertheless others did repine; and though they neither could nor durſt accuſe him of ill dealing for the preſent, yet ſeeing the overgreateſts of Selenus brought no leſs danger to the reſt of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they conſulted upon the ſame reaſon of State as before, how to oppoſe it in time. Neither was Selenus ignorant of what they had determined; for he read it in the Law univerſal of Kingdoms and States, needing no other Intelligence. Hereupon they forger friendſhips on all ſides, and cure themſelves of all unprofitable paſſions; the hatred of each to other, and their loves being laid on the one ſide, againſt their profits on the other, were found ſo far too light, as Selenus, who had to day ſlain Antigonus the Father, and driven Demetrius the Son out of Aſia, fought to morrow how to match himſelf with Stratonice, Demetrius his Daughter; and ſo by Demetrius to ſerve his turn againſt Lysimachus.

The ſtory of this Stratonice, with whom young Antiochus, the Son of Selenus fell ſo paſſionately in love, and ſo diſtempered, as Selenus his Father, to ſave his Son's life, gave her (though he were his Wife) unto him; and how his paſſion was diſcovered by his pulſe, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance between Selenus and Demetrius; between Ptolomy and Lysimachus; between Demetrius and Caffander; between Demetrius and Ptolomy, though for the preſent it brought him again into the rank of Kings; otherwiſe tye any of them to each other, than the marriage between Chriſtian Kings have done in latter times, namely between the Adrianes, the Arragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither have the Leagues of thoſe elder times been found more faithful, than thoſe of the ſame latter times have been, as in the ſories of Charles the Eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of France the Firſt, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Milan, and others, the Reader may obſerve; between whom from the year of our Lord, One thouſand four hundred ninety and five, when Charles the Eighth undertook the Conqueſt of Naples, to the year One thouſand five hundred fifty and eight, when Henry the Second died; the Hiſtorics of thoſe times tell us, that all the bonds, either by the Bed, or by the Book, either by Weddings or Sacramental Oaths had neither faithful purpoſe nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reap this profit by giving his Daughter to his enemy Selenus, that he recovered Cilicia from Phlatharchus, the Brother of Caffander, who had gotten it as his ſhare in the division of Antigonus his poſſeſſions: for the Intruder was not ſtrong enough to hold it by his proper forces, from him that entred upon it as a lawful heir; neither would Selenus lend him any help, as by the Rule of Confederacy he ſhould have done againſt the common enemy. So Phlatharchus with very angry complaints, as well againſt Selenus as Demetrius, went unto Caffander, whither Phila, their Siſter followed him ſtoutly, to pacifie them both, and kept all quiet; being ſent for that purpoſe by Demetrius her Husband, that was not ſtrong enough to deal with Caffander; and therefore glad to make uſe of that bond of alliance betwixt them, whereof in his own proſperity, he never took notice to the others good. About the ſame time he took to Wife a Daughter of Ptolomy (plurality of Wives being familiar with theſe Macedonians), that had learned it in their Eaſtern Conqueſts) and ſo was by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, than ſtrengthened with two friends; for neither of them withheld him any good, otherwiſe than might ſeem to advance their own ambitious deſires.

Selenus and Ptolomy could both of them have been contented better, that Demetrius, with help of their countenance, ſhould ſeeke his fortune ſomewhat farther off, than ſettle his Eſtate under their noſes. Particularly, Selenus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himſelf: and Ptolomy had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Iſle of Cyprus. Now whether it were ſo, that Selenus would ſain have ſet his new Father-in-law upon the neck of Lysimachus; or whether he were indeed greedy of the bargain; he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late purchaſe of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not hearken, but meant to keep as much Land as he could, having already found in Cilicia twelve thouſand Talents of his Father's Treſure, that would ſerve him to make poor a while. This reſul of diſpleaſed Demetrius, that in angry terms he demanded the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, to be ſurrendered unto him; which were the only places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battle. Inſtead of giving them up, Demetrius took preſent order to have them better manned; and ſpake it ſtoutly, That were he overcome a thousand times, yet would he not hire Selenus to become his Son-in-law. In this quarrel Selenus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would break friendship with his Father-in-law for two Towns, from whom he had already taken more than well he knew how to govern. But the fire consumed it self in words, which had it fastned upon arms, like it is that the weaker should have found friends out of envy to the stronger.

SECT. VI.

How Demetrius won the City of Athens, and prevailed in Greece, but lost in Asia. Of troubles in Macedonia following the death of Cassander.

IN the mean while, the Athenians not knowing how to use the liberty which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, under the Tyranny of Lachares. Through which alteration their distempered City was weakened, that it seemed ill able to keep off the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This advantage hastened him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to present himself unto them, in the habit of a revenging fury. He brought against them all the force that he could well spare from other employments, which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtful Eastern friends, were unwilling to give impediment to any business, that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprise in Athens had ill success; a great part of his Fleet perishing in a Tempest. But he soon repaired the loss; and (after some Victories in Peloponnesus, where he was divers Towns that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprise, wasted the Country of Attica, and cut off all relief from the City, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feed the great multitude within it, any long time: for it stood in a barren soil, and wanted now the command of those Islands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with victuals, and also detriture of means to keep such a Navy as might bring in supply, or dare to do any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolemy, who (trusting thereby to win the love of Greece) had laden an hundred and fifty ships with Corn, and sent them to relieve the hungry City. But these hundred and fifty were unable to deal with three hundred good fighting-ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore halted them away betimes, as having done enough, in adventuring to come so near that they might be defruded. This broke the heart of the people, among whom the famine was so extreme, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead Moulc, which dropped down between them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Ambassadors to yield up the Town, and crave pardon, having so far offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capital offence to propose any motion of peace. Yet were they fain to abolish this Decree, rather because they knew not what else to do, than because they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the Victory, did not only forbear to take away the lives of these unthankful men, which they had submitted unto his mercy; but out of his liberality gave them food, and placed in Office amongst them such as were most acceptable to the people. Nevertheless he was grown wiser than to trust them so far as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering exclamations) they bad him take their Havens, and dispose of them at his pleasure, he was ready to lay hold upon the word, and leave a sure Garrison within their Walls, to keep them honest-perforce. After this he went into Peloponnesus, vanquished the Lacedemonians in two Battels, and was in very fair possibility to take their City: when the dangerous news of Lysimachus and Ptolemy, that prevailed faster upon him elsewhere, than himself did upon his enemies in Greece, called him in all haste. Lysimachus had won many Towns in Asia; Ptolemy had gotten all the Isle of Cyprus, except the City of Salamis wherein Demetrius had left his Children and Mother, that were traitly besieged. Whilst he was bethinking himself which way to turn his face, a notable piece of business offered it self, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soon after him, Philip his eldest Son, whose two young Brethren, Antipater and Alexander, fought for the Kingdom. In this quarrel Thessalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Cassander had married, seemed better affected to Alexander, than to her eldest Son: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his own Mother. The odiousness of this fact gave a fair lustre to Alexander's cause: for the generality of the Macedonians to take his part, as in revenge of the Queens death, upon that wicked paricide Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lysimachus, whose Daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without some foreign aid. For which cause he called in both Phrygius and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will soon appear in the following Tragedy, of him and his Brother. Their Father Cassander had been one that thirft well for himself, at such times as every man sought to get somewhat, in the ill-ordered division of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, and a good Soldier; one of more open dealing than were his Companions, but withal more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely have made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, upon some opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditary quarrel, derived from his Father, whom the could not abide. Her feminine malice did to exasperate him, by cruelty that he used against his friends, both alive and dead; as it made him adventure upon shedding the Royal Blood: wherewith, when once he had stained his hands, he did not care how far he proceeded in that course of murder. His carelessness to destroy those women and children, whose lives hindered his purpose, argues him to have been rather skilful in matters of Arms, than a valiant man: such cruelty being a true mark of cowardize, which fears a far off the dangers, that may quietly pass away; and seeks to avoid them by base and unskillful means, as never thinking it self safe enough, until there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may be said, that they had well deserved the bloody end which which over-took them; yet ill-befamed it Cassander to do the Office of a Hang-man. But Alexander's children had by no Law of men deserved to dye for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the Divine Justice brought fwords upon his wife and children, that well revenged the cruelty of this bloody man, by destroying his whole house as he had done his Masters.

SECT. VII.

Of Pyrrhus and his doings in Macedonia. The death of Cassander's Children. Demetrius gets the Kingdom of Macedonia; prevails in War against the Greeks; loses reputation in his War against Pyrrhus; and in his Civil Government, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against Demetrius. Pyrrhus and Lysimachus invade him, his Army yields to Pyrrhus, who shares the Kingdom of Macedonia with Lysimachus.

Pyrrhus, the Son of that unfortunate Prince Alexander, which perished in War against Cassander, who hardly preserved, being a suckling Infant, from the fury of his Father's enemies. When his Father had conveyed him to Glaucias King of Epirus; the deadly hatred of Cassander would have bought his life with the price of two hundred Talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his heir. Glaucias was so far from betraying Pyrrhus, that he restored him by force to his Father's Kingdom, when he was but twelve years of age. Within the compals of six years, which the indifferencies of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, drove him out of his Kingdom, and left him to try the world anew. Then went he to Demetrius (who married his Sister) became his Page, followed him a while in his Wars, was with him in the great Battel of Issus, whence he fled with him to Ephesus; and was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolemy. In Egypt he so behaved himself, that he got the favour of Berenice, Ptolemy's principal Wife; so that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon sent home, with money and men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolemy, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdom of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that business between the Children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassander's Sons, was so far too weak for Pyrrhus, that he had no desire to attend the coming of Demetrius, but made an hasty agreement, and divided the Kingdom with his younger Brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aid of Pyrrhus to troublesome, that he was more willing to fend him away, than to call in such a nother helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacity to request, or take, as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acartania, and much more of the Country, as the reward of his pains: leaving the two Brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessity enforced the Brethren to composition: but their composition would not satisfy Demetrius, who took the matter haughtily, that he was sent for, and made a fool to come so far with an Army, and find no work for it. This was a frivolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to do as Pyrrhus had done; and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wife course, to remove this over-diligent friend, by murdering him upon some advantage. Thus Demetrius reported the story, and it might be true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, believed it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himself was feasted and slain by Demetrius, who took his part of the Kingdom, as a reward of the murder, executing the fact so well, by telling his own danger, and what a naughty man Cassander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was buied in War with a King of the wild Thracians; for thereby he was compelled to seek peace with Demetrius, which to obtain, he caused the remainder of Macedon to be given up; that is, the part belonging to Antipater his Son-in-law. At this ill bargain Antipater grievously stormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stormed, until his Father-in-law, to save the labour of making many excuses, took away his troublesome life. Thus in haste, with a kind of neglect, and as it were to avoid molestation, were slain the Children of Cassander: Of Cassander that had slain his own Masters Children, in a wife course of policy, with careful meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to erect his own house, that fell down upon his grave, ere the earth on it was thoroughly settled.

It might be thought, that such an access of Dominion, added much to the greatness of Demetrius. But indeed it shewed his minority; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of Civil Government: but thought (or thought by his actions that he thought) the use and fruit of a Kingdom, to be none other, than to do what a King listed. He gave himself over to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those which offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing Justice. He had more skill in getting a Kingdom, than in ruling it: War being his recreation, and Luxury his nature. By long rest (as six years reign is long to him, that knows not how to reign one year) he discovered so much of his worst conditions, as made the people both weary of his idleness, and the Soldiers of his vanity. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost; though more especially, by hearing that Ptolemy had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his Mother and Children. This afforded him the better leisure of making War in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their City twice in short space, but used his victory with mercy. Against Lysimachus he would fain have done somewhat (the peace between them notwithstanding) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came: so as this Journey purchased nothing but enmity. Another Expedition he took in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse event. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Maecdon, which he had indeed as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdom; he had also made excursions executions into Thebais. But there needed not any hardi-mere presence of guard, seeing Demetrius thought himself strong enough to overcome his Enemies Country, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the virtue of those, whom they have known raw Novices in that faculty, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinary. Pyrhus was a Captain, whom latter Ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the rank of Generals, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexander's followers. At this time, he misled that part of the Army, which Demetrius led, and fell upon the other half: which he overthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his private valour. He shewed in single combat against Pantaneus, Demetrius's Lieutenant, who being a strong man of body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was utterly beaten. The loss of this Battle did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behaviour of Pyrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the lively figure of Alexander in his best quality. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexander's graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (said they) none, save Pyrhus, is like him in deed, in performing the Office of a Captain.

These Rumours were not more nourished by the virtue of the Epist, than by dislike of their own King; whom they began to dislike, not so much in regard of his unprofitable Journey into Episus (for he had wasted much of the Country, and brought home his Army in good case) as of his Insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparel seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not only too sumptuous and new-fangled, but very unmanly; and serving chiefly to be a daily witness, how much he contemned them and their good opinions. Of his Soldiers lives he was reckless; and suffered unwisely this unprincely licence to escape out of his mouth. That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. He made a mockery of Justice; and (as it were, to publish unto all his Subjects, how little he esteemed it or them) having by a few of popularity invited Prisoners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poor Suters after him in great hope, till coming to a Bridge, he threw all their Writings into a River; pleasing himself, in that he could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses he grew so odious, that Pyrhus gathered audacity, and invading Macedon, had almost won it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sick in his bed; who recovering health, and taking the field, had such great odds of strength, as made Pyrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he began to have some feeling of the general hate; which to redress, he did not (for he could not) alter his own conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on work in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appear; that is, in a great War. His intent was to invade Asia with a Royal Army; wherein the fortune of one Battle might give him as much as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made peace with Pyrhus; that he might leave all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Army of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelve thousand horses, with a Navy of five hundred fail, wherein were many ships, far exceeding the grounds of any that had been seen before; yet so swift and useful withal, that the greatness was least part of their commendations.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolemy suspect their own forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrhus, to join against this ambitious Son of Antigonus, that was like to prove more dangerous to them all, than ever was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Asia, there could be no security for his friends in Europe, what league however were of old concluded. Therefore they resolved to begin with him betimes, and each to invade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his own Kingdom. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Army: but whilst he was yet on the way, news were brought into his Camp, that Pyrhus had won Berbera. The matter was not over great; were it not that minds prepared with long discourse, are ready to lay hold upon small occasions of dislike. All the Camp was in uproar: some wept, others grieved; few or none did forbear to utter seditious words, and many desired leave of Demetrius, to go to their own houses, meaning indeed to have gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Army, he thought it the wisest way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lysimachus their own Country man, against Pyrhus; that was a stranger: hoping by victory against the Episus, to recover the love of his followers in such sort that he might afterwards at leisure deal with the other. But herein his wisdom beguiled him. For the Soldiers were as hasty as he, to meet with Pyrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others answered, of his person, his armour, and other tokens whereby he might be known; his particularly, by a pair of Goats horns, that he wore on his creel. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Divers of them stole away, and ran over into Pyrhus's Camp: where the news that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get sight of Pyrhus, they would all salute him King. To try this, Pyrhus rode forth, and presented himself bareheaded in view of all the Camp, whether some were sent before to prepare his welcome. The news of his arrival found a general applause, and every one began to look out, with desire to set eye on him. His face was not so well known as his Belcher; therefore he was admonished to put it on; which done, all came about him, and proffered their services; neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius; only some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bad him be gone hence, and shift for himself. So Demetrius threw aside his Masker's habit, and attiring himself poorly, did fearfully steal away out of his own Camp, deserveth well this calamity: whether it were so, that he would not hearken to the good counsel of his friends; or whether his behaviour deprived him of such friends, as would dare to let him hear the unpleasant sound of necessary truth.

Whilst Pyrhus was making this triumphant entry into the Kingdom of Macedon, Lysimachus came upon him very unseasonably, and would needs have half: saying, That he had done as much as Pyrhus in the War; and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gain. The bargain was quickly made, and the division agreed upon: each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them to work his fellow quite out of all, upon better opportunity.

SECT. VIII.

How Demetrius gathering Forces, enterprised many things with ill success, in Greece and Asia. How he was driven upon Seelus, and compelled to yield himself: His imprisonment and death.

The Athenians were as unthankful to Demetrius in this his adversity, as they had been in former times. For they presently forsook his friendship, and called Pyrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius when he went against Lysimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, under his Son Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had been gotten an Army, though Phila's wife (who is highly commended for a wife and virtuous Lady) did poison her self, upon desperate grief for his misfortune. The first, upon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians that had well deserved it. He began to lay siege to their Town: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they had made their spokes-man; and taking fair words instead of satisfaction, passed over into Asia, with eleven thousand Soldiers, meaning to try his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Provinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first coming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile upon him. For many good Towns willingly, or by compulsion, yielded to his obedience. There were also some Captains that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their companies and treasures. But it was not long ere Agathocles the Son of Lysimachus, came upon him with an Army so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stock against it. Wherefore he resolved to pass through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Provinces of the higher Asia; trusting to find a Kingdom somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsel was grievously impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his provisions, driving him to take which ways he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes Demetrius vanquished this troublesome enemy: nevertheless he could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poor titular Kings, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the river Lycus, so many of Demetrius's men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were driven to travel with such speed as might be called a plain flight. So that with famine, pestilence, diseases following famine, and other accidents of War, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest with their Captains, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilst Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius's errand, to lay claim to the Country; but with vehemence and humble Letters he besought his Son-in-law to call to mind their alliance, and to pity him in his great misery. These Letters at the first wrought well with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himself, when he recovered strength after the battle at Issus, he changed his purpose and went against him with an Army.

Many treaties were held between them: of which none took effect, through the jealousy of Seleucus. Therefore more desperation enforced Demetrius to fight like a mad man, and his injuries got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sickness took and held him forty days, in which time, a great number of his few men ran to the enemy. This notwithstanding, he still held out, and once had like to have taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his coming been discovered by Fugitives, that gave alarm. Finally, when all his Army had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himself, he was compelled by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few forsook him) to yield unto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceedingly glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his own humanity by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindered him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he used him with as much favour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept under sure guard in a dunsy-land, wherein were goodly Walks, Orchards, and Parks for hunting. He had all that he asked royally, and friends allowed to visit him, at this, and their pleasure. Only his liberty was reserved unto the coming of young Antiochus and Stratonice, out of the high Countries. In this sort he spent three years, now merrily all the while (as one that living enjoyed the happiness, which with so much travel and blood shed he had sought in vain) and then died, leaving in his Son Antigonus, the fame which his Father had left unto himself; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Corinth; his qualities have appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his house, will tell it self hereafter, in times and places convenient.

SECT. IX.

The death of Ptolemy, of Lysimachus, and of Seleucus, that was the last of Alexander's Captains: with other occurrences.

About the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolemy King of Egypt, a virtuous Prince, war-like, bountiful, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardless of his word. He had by many Wives and Concubines, many Children, out of whom he selected Ptolemy Philadelphus, and caused him to reign together with himself, two or three years before he died, that he might confirm him in the Inheritance of the Kingdom. At this, Ptolemy Ceraneus (for all that house assumed the name of Ptolemy) was grievously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gave him loving entertainment. There were now only two of Alexander's Captains left, Seleucus and Lysimachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liver of that brave Company. The true ground of their quarrel, rel, was their near equality or strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lysimachus had committed upon many of his Nobles, together with his poisoning Agathocles his eldest Son : whose wife and children fled unto Selenus for aid.

The Macedonians, after seven months pause, having spent their first heat of admiration, began to hearken so well to Lysimachus, their natural Countryman, that they took Pyrrius, upon none other ground than because he was an Alien. This they had known well enough before : but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, that they lightly gave him. Lysimachus had reigned about five years alone, when the City of Lysimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earth-quake, appeared by events, to have fore-shewed the fall of his house. His own jealousy, and the indignation of a mother-in-law, caused him to poison his son Agathocles : which drew upon him that War, wherein (after the loss of all his fifteen Children that were taken away by divers accidents) he perished himself.

Selenus was encountered by Lysimachus on Asa Isle, where one battle concluded the War, with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Selenus more than the Victory, that he was the last of all the great Heroes that followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himself as Lord and Heir of all the conquered World. So he passed over into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his days, and within seven months followed Lysimachus, and others of his fellows, by a bloody death, being treacherously slain by Philomy Ceranus, whole friend and Patron he had been. Seventy and seven year old he was, when he fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seventy and four. With them ended the generation of old Captains, that had seen the days as it were of another World under the Persian : yet was there left one equal to any of them in the Art of War : even Pyrrius the Epirot, of whom we spoke before : that is now ready to enter into War with the Romans, a more warlike people, than Alexander himself did ever encounter. Of which War, and of which people, it is needful that we here make mention, as of a story more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdoms that were held by Alexander's Successors, with less (and still decreasing) virtue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome, and settling of the Eastern Kingdoms.

SECT. I.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominions in Italy, from the death of Tullus Hostilius unto such time as they were assailed by Pyrrhus.

How Rome was founded by Romulus ; settled in good order by Numa Pompilius ; and by many (though small) Victories, gathered strength, unto such time as it became the Head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the Reign of Tullus Hostilius ; it hath been already noted in the order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatness beginneth to encounter the power of Greece, and extending it self out of Italy, to overwhelm the Dominions of other States, and Princes : I hold it convenient (as in like cases I have done) briefly to set down the growth of this mighty City, in a compendious relation of those many Actions, which could not have been delivered in the Ages, wherein they were severally performed, without much interruption of the History, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when he had reigned two and thirty years, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Anus Martius, Grand-child to Numa Pompilius by his Daughter, and not much unlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdom of Rome. He walled the City about ; enlarged it with the Hill Aventinus, which he enclosed ; built a Bridge, over Tybris, and the City of Olbia upon the Sea, sixteen miles distant from Rome. Finally, having reigned four and twenty years, he died, and by his last Will he left his Children in charge with one Lucumon, the son of Damaratus a Corinthian, who avoiding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyrannical, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquinius, by the name of which Town he was afterward called Tarquinius. From that City in Hetruria coming to Rome and encouraged by some ominous occurrences, together with his Wife Tanaquil's prophecy, he grew a favourite of Anus Martius ; by his Grecian wit honouring the factions of the Roman Court, inasmuch, that after his decease he became not only Protector to the children, but Governour to the City. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centuries of Horsemen : neither was he less eminent in War, than in Peace : for he prevailed often against the Tuscan, and from his Victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph took their original. When this Lucius Tanaquilus had reigned eight and thirty years, he was slain by the sons of Anus Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiving what was done, informed the people, from out of an high Tower, that her Husband was wounded, and sick, but not dangerously. And withal signified unto them, that in the interim of his sickness, one Servius Tullius, whom from his birth she always prophesied to be born to great hopes (the Son of P. Corniculanus, and and Orestia a well defended, but captive woman) brought up in her house, and husband unto her daughter, should supply her husbands place, in governing the State, until his recovery : which government, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards usurped as his right. He first ordered Ratements, Subsidies and Valuations of the peoples wealths among whom, at that time, four-score thousand were mulctured, of which number consisted their whole Corporation; and by distinguishing the Kingdom in as good sort as it had been a private household. At length, having two daughters of different natures, the one mild and gentle, the other fierce and outrageous : and finding also that the two sons of Tarquinius Priscus, Sextus and Arunt, which had been committed unto his tuition, were of different dispositions proportionably answering to his daughters ; he (willing to add water, not oil, to fire) gave the mild daughter to Sextus the hot-headed son, and the violent, to Arunt the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended couages, or by accident, it happened, that the two mild ones being made away, the furious natures were readily joined in marriage : who soon concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claim to the Kingdom. Upon this tumult, Servius Tullius hasting to the Senate, (where he thought by Authority to have bridled Insolency) was thrown down the stairs, and going home fore bruised, was slain by the way, when he had reigned forty four years. Then Julia his daughter, first proclaiming her Husband Tarquinius Superbus King, returning home, enforced her Coachman to drive his Chariot over her Father's corpse : whereupon the street had the denomination of Wicked-direct. This Tarquinius, exercising cruelty without justice, and Tyranny without mercy, upon the people and Senators ; having tired himself and them at home, used the same rage of treachery upon his borders. He took Oriculan, Stessa, Formia, and the Gabii. The issue of begetting Ardea, a Town eighteen mile distant from Rome, was of bad fortunes. In the heat of which War, his Son Sextus Tarquinius violently ravished that chaste Lady Lucretia, his kinsman Collatine's wife : who in way of expiation for so unchast a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamy with her own blood ; so (having first bequeathed the revenge unto her Father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her Husband Collatine and Junius Brutus) she killed her self : whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his Wife and Children, was deposed and banished, and fled to Porfenna King of Hetruria for succour, in the five and twentieth year of his reign, and the two hundred forty and fourth from the building of their City : in which space Rome had scarce gotten possession of fifteen miles round about her.

Junius Brutus by the help of Collatine, having expelled Tarquinius, and freed his Country from that heavy yoke of bondage, enforced the people by solemn oath, never to admit any government by Kings amongst them : whereupon they ransacked their Kings goods, consecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the government of the State upon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their ears, they changed the manner of their government, from perpetual to annual, and from a single Government to a double ; lest perpetual or sole dominion might be some motive to usurpation ; and instead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers : that their Titles might remember them of their place, which was to be always mindful of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard settling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innovation of State, scarce daring to assure themselves of their own security, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to resign up his authority, fearing that Tyranny would be hereditary ; and supposing that the very name and affinity with the house of Tarquinius, favoured already of their condition. In his room was substituted Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the peoples eyes, gave liberty in matters of controvercie to appeal from the Consuls to the people, and that he might as well in goods as in person, avoid occasion of suspicion, caused his own house to be pulled down, because it was built in a place defensible, as if it had been a Citadel. Neither was Brutus any ways deficient in matter of greater moment ; which concerned as well the peoples safety, as their favour : for having got intelligence, that some Grecian wits, and in the first rank his own Sons, were itching after innovations, hoping to restore the banished Kings ; he caused them, publicly in the Market-place, to be whipped, and then to be brought all unpunished to the blocks.

Hitherto the Romans, having by the unblemished integrity of Brutus, well appealed all inbred quarrels at home, now hereafter employed their military designments against Foragers : first, for their liberty ; secondly, for enlarging of their possessions ; and lastly, for defending their confederate Provinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, situated as it were in the mid-way between Latium and the Tuscan, having as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minority, could not but give occasion of offence to her neighbours ; until by main opposition, having prevailed against her borders, she used them as instruments whereby to obtain the rest.

Their first war, in the first year of Consuls, was against Porfenna King of Hetruria : who being over-perwaded by Tarquinius his lamentation came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to feat him again in his Kingdom.

In the first conflict, Horatius Coles, having long time born the main brunt of his enemies on the Bridge over Tybris, at length, feeling himself too faint to stand against so many, caused the bridge behind him to be broken down, and with his armour leaping into the River, like a hunted Stag, refreshed his hot spirits, and returned safe to his fellows, with the like resolution to sustain a new charge. Porfenna, although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Janiculum, which is the very entrance into the City, and found the Victory, in a manner assuredly his own yet admiring their valour and terrified by the constant resolution of Marius Scaevola who having by error slain Porfenna his Secretary, instead of the King himself, did in scorn of torments threatened, burn off his own hand : he thought it not any whit prejudicial either to his safety, or credit, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleen was not quite abated, though Arunt his Son, and Brutus his enemy, in single combat had slain each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field ; and their Ladies, whose Champion he was, for their chastity, not for beauty, rewarded the loss of him one whole year. Into this place, for the residue of his year was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia; and in his room (deceasing naturally before the year expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquinius, upon his overthrow, feeling the fates difficult, thought it no longer to strive against the stream, but spent the residue of his time, which was about fourteen years, privately at Tusculum. Yet his Son-in-law Mucius Tatullianus, flaming a-fresh at those old repulses, because Porcia had made peace with the Romans, and denied further succour unto the Tarquines, mulctured up his Latin, and gave battle to the Romans, at the Lake Regillus; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue uncertain, until Aulus Posthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consuls, purposely for this war, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Soldiers courage, threw their own Ensigns amidst the Enemies and Cappas, or Spurs Effusi; (Matter of the Horse men, an allusive Office to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might run with free violence, to recover again their Ensigns. This fight was so well performed, that a report went of Capor and Tolux, two gods, who came on milk-white Steeds to be eyewitnesses of their valour, and fellow-helpers of their Victory; for the General consecrated a Temple to them, as a lifeguard for their pains. After this the Romans fierce spirits, having no object of valour abroad, reflected upon themselves at home and the sixteenth year after the King's expulsion, upon indignation of some desperate bankrupts, thinking themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an uproar in the holy Mount; until by Menenius Agrippa, his discomfitment, of the inconvenience in the Head and Belly's discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate; with condition, that they might have some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appeal in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controversies, the Consuls authority notwithstanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attornment among themselves, they had continual War with the Latins, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Among these, the Volsci and Aequi held them longest; who made War of themselves upon the Romans; whereby they lost the best City in their whole jurisdiction, Corioli.

In this Conquest, T. Manlius got the surname of Coriolanus; a name honourable then, as drawn from a great Victory; although, by reason of the poverty of the Town, a Roman General, in after times, would have been ashamed of that Title. But yet these graces had been no occasion of disparagement, had he not afterwards in a great time of dearth, advised to sell Corn, which they procured from Stiel, at too high a rate, to the people, whereupon Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalf, accused him, and after judgement banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsci, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renew their forces again; which being committed unto him, and to Atilius Tullus, he prevailed in field, so far forth, that he was come within four or five miles of the City. Incamping there, he made so sharp war, and was at such defiance with his Country, that he would not relent by any supplication of Ambassadors, until his Mother Veturia, and Volturnia his Wife, with a pitiful tune of deprecation, shewing themselves better Subjects to their Country than friends to their Son and Husband, were more available to Rome than was any force of Arms. Hereupon Coriolanus dismissing his Army, was after put to death among the Volsci, (as others surmise) living with them until old age, he died naturally.

Not long after this the Veii in Hetruria, provoked the Romans; against whom the Fabii, three hundred and six in number, all of one Family, in-treated and obtained, that they only might be employed, as it had been in a private quarrel. These Fabii, after some good services, lying incamped at Cremora, were circumvented, and fell by reason of infancy, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In process of time, the Romans were also troubled at the Volsci, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minutius their Consul, with his whole Army, had been discomfited, had not L. Quinctius Cincinnatus chosen Dictator, and taken from the Plow to the highest honour in Rome, with success answerable to his expedition, dispersed his enemies, and freed his Country in the space of sixteen days. In the continuance of this Veistian War, it was that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two years before chosen Governors of the State, and Enactors of Solon's Laws amongst them, procured from Athena (abrogating in the mean while the Consuls, and all other Magistrates) would have ravished Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginus, Captain of a company, and lying then in a Camp at Algidum. Here, upon the people in an uproar took the Hill Aventine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men to resign up their Authority again to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or desire to revenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new War against the Veientes and their adherents, upon whom, having tried their forces with diversity of Captains, and variety of event, they vanquished the Falsci, and the Fidenates, and utterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falsci, Furius Camillus shewed no less integrity than fortitude. For when a Schoolmaster, by training forth into the Roman Camp, many children of the principal Citizens thought to betray the Town, yielding them all up as hostages: Camillus delivered this Traitor bound unto his Soldiers, willing them to whip him back into the City; which forthwith yielded unto him in reverence of his Justice. The siege of Veii was ten years, and so troublesome, that the Romans were there first enforced to winter abroad under beasts skins (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they received pay) and to make vows never to return without Victory.

At length winning the City by a Mine, they got so large spoils, that they consecrated their tents to Apollonius; and the whole people in general were called to the manficking of the City. But yet they were no less unthankful to Camillus for his service, than before they had been to Coriolanus, for they banished him the City, upon some occasion of inequality in dividing the spoils; yet he requited their unkindness with a new piece of service against the fury of the Gauls; who being a populous Country, and very healthful, the fathers (as sometimes now) lived so long, that the sons, destitute of means, were enforced to rove abroad broad, seeking some place to set up their rest; and withal being a Nation vain in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandered as Rovers over many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italy, first upon Clusium a Town in Hetruria; whereof Rome having information (and being careful of her Confederate Towns) sent Ambassadors, warning them to desist from such injurious enterprizes. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, upon some injury offered by the Roman Ambassadors, converted their forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow unto the Romans, by the River Alia, upon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for unlucky, and called Aliastris in the Roman Calendar) they marched towards the City. Then was Rome the true map of misery and desolation. For some leaving the City: some creeping into holes, Priests hiding their reliques; and every one shifting for himself ere the enemy came, Rome was abandoned as indefensible. The Vestal Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conveyed away; the Ancients of the City, gathering boldness out of desperate fear, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the World, did for themselves in Thrones, in their several houses, hourly expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to die, as they had lived, in State. The younger sort, with M. Manlius their Captain, took upon them to make good the Capitol.

By this the Gauls were entered the City, who seeing all quiet, at first suspected some ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoil, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senators, they sat in their Majesty with a grave resolution; having first revered them as gods, anon they tried whether they would die like men. When the City was thoroughly rifled, they attempted the Capitol: which held them work for the space of seven months. Once they were like to have surprised it by night, but being deflected by the gaggling of Geese, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a compulsion was agreed upon: the Gauls being weary, and the Romans hungry. The bargain was, that the Gauls should take a thousand pound weight in gold. Whilst the gold was in weighing, the Gauls, with open infidelity, made their weights too heavy: Brennus their Captain, casting his Sword into the balance, and with a proud exprobration, saying, that the vanquished must be patient perforce. But in the midst of this cavilling came Furius Camillus with an Army from Ardea, (where he had lived in his banishment) and fell upon the Gauls with such violence, that he dispersed their troops, quenched the fire of the City with their blood, forcing them to restore the spoils with advantage, and forbear the gold, in accepting which they had lately been so nice. Further, having rid the City of them, he so hotly pursued them thorow a great part of Italy, that the remainder of their Army which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gauls, which followed this first, had the like ill success. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in single fight flew a several Champion of the Gauls) abated their presumption, and restored courage to the Roman Camillus. For his noble service, was afterwards accounted a second Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their City, were earnestly bent to go to the Veii to inhabit, but Camillus dissuaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Veii they changed their government from Consuls to military Tribunes. The government of these also, after some years, was by civil diffinition interrupted: so that one while Consuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchy. Then the Tribunes were reformed and ruled again, till, after many years expired, the Consular Authority was established, it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should always be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365 years. And now Rome, by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minority, dares for forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirty miles off: situated between Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campesians their neighbours, that they forced them to yield themselves subjects to Rome, and undergo any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoever else to obtain protection; which the Romans, although both Countries had been their confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should devour the less, easily allowed of; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the abundance of Corn and Wine, pleasant Cities and Towns, but especially Capua itself, the fairest City then in all Italy.

The families of the Papyrii and Fabii were most employed in the managing of this War, which endured the space of fifty years. And in this season were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountered by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius and Sp. Posthumus were Consuls, and discomfited by Fastinus at Caudium, with no small ignominy; and when Q. Fabius Gurges lost the field with three thousand men. But for those losses, many great Victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrel. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but less warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these Countries, became at length, tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long War it was, (though in time of truce between the Roman and Samnites) that the Latins began to challenge equal freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to have one of the Consuls yearly chosen out of them.

This demand of the Latins was not unreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latin Colony; besides a which, they made offer to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud to admit any such capitulation. So a great barrel was fought between them: wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the virtue of the Consuls.

Manlius Torquatus and the elder Decius were then Consuls, whom the Soothsayers advertised, that the tide should be victorious which lost the General in life. Hereupon Decius the Consul exposed his life to the enemy, and purchased victory (as was believed) by his death. In which kind of devoting himself for his Army, the son of this Decius being after Consul, did imitate his Father in the Hetrurian War. But (as Tully well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decii, that purchased victory, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Soldiers followed them, than than any great commendation of such a Religion, as required the lives of so worthy Citizens, to be sacrificed for their Country. The discipline of Marius was no less resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forsake his place, and fight single with an enemy. For breach of which order, he caused his own son to be put to death, who had slain a Captain of the Latins, being challenged in single fight.

When the Latins, the Æqui, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with some other people, were brought under obedience; it was a vain labour for any people of Italy to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabiner ventured to try their fortune, and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consul, wailing all their Country with fire and sword from the River Nar and Felcia, to the Adriatic Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians, that made trial of the Roman arms, were the Tarentine and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as mediators between the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptory denunciation of War, unto that party which should dare to refuse peace; when tendered. These threats which discovered their bad affection unto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were utterly subdued, matter enough of quarrel was found to examine their ability of performance.

The Romans complained that certain ships of theirs were robbed, and sent Ambassadors unto Tarentum, to require amends. Upon some wrong done to these Ambassadors, was laid the foundation of that War, wherein the Lucani, Messapians, Eruvians, and Apulians, joining with the Tarentine, procured the Samnites, and other Subjects of Rome to rebel and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their own weakness. Wherefore they agreed to send for Pyrrhus, by whose aid (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceived, that the Dominion of Rome should be confined unto more narrow bounds than all Italy, which already in a manner it did overspread.

SECT. II.

How Pyrrhus married upon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battles.

Pyrrhus forsaken by the Macedonians, and unable to deal with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to lie in rest; which he abhorred no less than a wiser Prince would have desired. He had a strong Army, and a good Fleet, which in that unsettled state of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdom: but the fall of Demetrius had so increased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdom to make an offensive War upon him, without far greater forces: Antigonus, the son of Demetrius, held Corinth at the same time, and some other Towns, with the remainder of his Father's Army and treasures, left in his hand. Upon him it is like that Pyrrhus might have won, but it was better to let him alone, that he might serve to give some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of employment, and covetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Ambassadors came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with brave offers, as needing no other aid than his good conduct, which to obtain, they would cast themselves under his protection. They had in their company some of the Samnites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised in behalf of their several Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that he might enlarge his Empire to the West, as far as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one victory open the gate unto another. To which effect it is said, that once he answered Cynæas his chief Counsellour, asking what he meant to do after every of the victories which he hoped to get: that having won Rome, he would soon be Master of all Italy; that, after Italy he would quickly get the Isle of Sicily; that out of Sicily, he would pass over into Affrick, and win Carthage, with all the rest of the Countreys; and being strengthened with the force of all these Provinces, he would be too hard for any of those that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cynæas enquired yet further, what they should do, when they were Lords of all. Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would live merrily; a thing (as Cynæas then told him) that they presently might do, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his own.

Nevertheless, this Italian Expedition seemed unto Pyrrhus a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholastical disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Army, of almost thirty thousand men, well fortified, and well trained soldiers: part of which he sent over before him under Cynæas, with the rest he followed in person. At his coming, he found the Tarentines very prompt of tongue, but in manner of execution, utterly careless to provide for the War. Wherefore he was fain to shut up their Theatre, and other places of pleasure and resort, enforcing them to take Arms, and making such a strict muster, as was to them very unpleasant, though greatly behooving to their estate.

Whilst he was occupied with these cares, Levinus the Roman Consul drew near, and began to waste Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this War.

The Lucanians were not ready to defend their own Country; the Samnites were careless of the harm, that fell not (as yet) upon themselves; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would have been, but their valour was little: all of these had been accustomed to shrink for fear of the Roman fortitude; and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more upon his own forces, than the issue of their vaunting promises. He was now driven either to set forward with those that himself had brought into Italy, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which by all means he was careful to uphold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had been scattered by foul weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which he resolved to assay the valour of the Romans, against whom he proudly marched.

Levinus the Consul was not affrighted with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and give him battle ere all his adherents should be ready to join with him. This boldness of the Roman, and the slackness of the

Messapians,

Messapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger most concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a Treaty of peace: requiring to have the quarrel between the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to win time, that the Samnites and their fellows might arrive at his Camp; or whether, considering better at near distance, the weight of the business which he had taken in hand, he were desirous to quit it with his honours, the short answer that was returned to his proposition, gave him no means of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Judge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hercupon both Armies halted their march unto the River of Siris; Levinus intending to fight before the arrival of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from passing that River, until his own Army were full. Upon the first view of the Roman Camp, it was readily conceived by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to do with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a brave discipline of War: which caused him to let a strong Corps de garde upon the passage of the River, that he might not be compelled to fight, until he saw his best advantage. But he gloriously found, that this new enemy was not only skilful in the Art of War, but courageous in execution. For the Roman Army cutted the Ford, in face of his Corps de garde, and their horse, at the same time began to pass the River in sundry places: which caused the Greeks to forsake the defence of their bank, and speedily retire unto their Camp.

This audacity forced Pyrrhus to battle; where, while he thought it best to present them, ere the whole Army had recovered firm footing, and were in order. So directing his Captains how to marshal his battels; himself with the horse charged upon the Romans: who stoutly received him as men well exercised in sustaining furious impetuous. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the duty of a careful General; nor his providence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personal valour. It behoved him indeed to do his best; for he never met with better opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slain under him: afterwards he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the use of his King's armour, which was torn from his back. This accident had almost lost him the battle; but he perceiving it, discovered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and took from the Romans their vain joy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater loss (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus's side, as long as only spear and sword were used. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose unusual form and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (unaccustomed to the like) were not able to sustain; then was the victory quickly gotten. For the Roman battels, perceiving their horse put to the rout, and driven out of the field; finding also themselves both charged in flank, and overborn, by the force and huge bulk of those strange beasts; gave way to necessity, and saved themselves, as well as they could, by hasty flight: In which contention, they were so forgetful of their Discipline, that they tarried not to defend their Camp, but ran quite beyond it, leaving both it, and the honour of the day entirely to Pyrrhus.

The name of this Victory was soon spread over Italy; and the reputation was no less than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Consul, with a select Army, should lose in plain battle, not only the Field, but the Camp it self, being so notably fortified as they always were. And this honour was the more bravely won by Pyrrhus, for that he had with him none of his Italian friends, save the unwearied Tarentines. Neither could he well display his content that he took, in having the glory of this action peculiarly his own, at such time as he blamed the Lucans and Samnites, for coming (as we say) a day after the Fair. Nevertheless he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them whilst with his honour he might; and to that purpose he sent unto them Cynæas his Ambassador, demanding only to have the Tarentines permitted to live at rest, and himself accepted as their official friend. This did Cynæas, with all his cunning, and with liberal gifts labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their desire of recovering their Captives, or their danger, by the rising of many States in Italy against them, to incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appianus Claudius, an old and blind Senator, did stir them up to make good their honour by War. So they returned answer, that whilst Pyrrhus abode in Italy, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report that Cynæas made at his return, of the Roman puissance and virtue, as kindled in Pyrrhus a great desire of confederacy with that gallant City. Hercupon many kind Offices passed between them: but still when he urged his motion of peace, the answer was: He must first depart out of Italy, and then treat of peace.

In the mean season, each part made provision for War; the Romans levying a more mighty Army than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthened with access unto his forces of all the East parts of Italy. So they came to the trial of a second battle, wherein (though after long and cruel fight) the boisterous violence of the Elephants gave to Pyrrhus a second victory. But this was not altogether so joyful as the former had been: rather it gave him cause to say, that such another Victory would be his utter undoing. For he had lost the flower of his Army in this battle; and though he drove the Romans into their Camp, yet he could not force them out of it, nor law any likelihood in prevailing against them, that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilst he should be driven to spend upon his old stock. Neither could he expect that his Elephants should always stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight would soon teach the Romans, that were apt Scholars in such learning, how to make them unserviceable. Wherefore he desired nothing more, than how to carry his honour safe out of Italy; which to do (seeing the Romans would not help him, by offering or accepting any fair conditions of peace, or of truce) he took a slight occasion, presented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

SECT. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicil.
How Pyrrhus, being invited into Sicil, forsook Italy, man the mist of the Ille, and lost it in short space. Pyrrhus returns into Italy, where he is beaten by the Romans, and so goes back to his own Kingdom.

WHEN Ptolemy Ceranus had traitorously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he presently seized upon all the Dominions of Ly-fianachus in Europe, as if they had been the due reward unto him, that had slain the Conqueror.
The houses of Cassander and Lyfianachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength and reputation enough to advance himself against Ceranus. The friends of Lyfianachus were rather plucked to have him their King, that had (as he professed) revenged their Lord's death; than any way offended with the disinfect of his fact, by which they were freed from subjection to one, against whom they had flood in opposition. Many there were, that upon remembrance of his Father's great virtue gathered hope of finding the like in Ceranus: perceiving themselves that his reign might prove good, though his entrance had been wicked. These affections of the Macedonians did serve to declare Antigonus the son of Demetrius, that made an attempt upon the Kingdom. As for Antiochus the son of Seleucus, he was far off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Army near unto Europe. Yet he made great show of meaning to revenge his Father's death: but being stronger in money than in Arms, he was content, after a while to take fair words, and make peace with the murderer. While these three move about the Kingdom, Pyrrhus who thought his claim as good as any of theirs, made use of their diffidence: threatening War, or promising his assistance to every one of them, by such means he strengthened himself, and greatly advantaged his Italian Voyage, which he had then in hand: requesting money of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and Soldiers of Ptolemy, who gave him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Soldiers, and of Elephants (covenanting to have them restored at two years end) more for fear than for love: that so he might free himself from trouble, and quietly enjoy his Kingdom.

Thus Ptolemy grew mighty on the fudden; and the power that by wicked means he had gotten, by means as wicked he increased.

All Macedon and Thracia being his, the strong City of Cassandria was held by Antiochus his sister, the Widow of Lyfianachus, who lay therein with her young children. Her he circumvented by making love to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, where Princes regarded no degree of incest, guilting) taking her to wife, with promise to deliver her children: a promise that he meant not to perform; for he was not long, ere he slew them, and drove her into exile.

In the pride of his good success, which his vil-lany found, vengeance came upon him from a far, by the fury of a Nation that he never heard of.
Pyrrhus a Captain of the Gauls having forced his passage through many Countries, unto the confines of Macedon, sent a proud message to Ceranus, commanding him to buy peace with money, or otherwise, to look for all the miseries of War. These Gauls were the race of those, that issued out of their Country, to seek new seats: that great expedition, wherein Brennus took and burnt the City of Rome. They had divided themselves, at their setting forth, into two companies; of which the one fell upon Italy; the other, passing through the Countries that lie on the Northern side of the Ad-riatick Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, and the Regions adjoining, where they forced all the Neighbour Princes to redeem peace with tribute, as now they would have compelled Ceranus to do:

unto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight years after such time as their fellows had taken Rome.

When their Ambassadors came to Ptolemy, asking what he would give: his answer was, that he would be contented to give them peace, but it must be with condition, that they should put into his hands their Princes as Hostages, and yield up their arms; otherwise he would neither pardon their boldness, nor give any credit to their words. At this answer, when it was returned, the Gauls did laugh; saying, That they would soon confute with deeds, the vanity of such proud words. It may seem strange, that he, who had given away part of his Army unto Pyrrhus, for very fear, should be so confident in undertaking more mighty enemies. The King of the Dardanians offered to lend him twenty thousand men against the Gauls: but he scorned the offer; saying, That he had the children of those, which under the conduct of Alexander had subdued all the East. Thus he issued forth against all the barbarous people with his famous Macedonians, as if the Victory must needs have followed the reputation of a great Name. But he soon found his great error when it was too late.
For the enemies were not only equal in strength of body, and fierceness of courage, but so far superior to the Macedonians in number, that few or none escaped their fury. Ptolemy himself grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whilst the battle continued; and they presently strook off his head, which they shewed to his men on the top of a Lance, to their utter astonishment.

The report of this great overthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Towns, and abandoned the whole Country as lost. Only Sophones a valiant Captain, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Army, with which he many times got the upper hand, and hindered Belgus from using the Victory at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his virtue, the Soldiers would have made him King; which title he refused, and was contented with the name of a General. But as mischances drew him come alone) the good success of Belgus did fill Macedon, Brennus another Captain of the Gauls, with an hundred and fifty thousand foot and fifteen thousand horse, against which mighty Army, when Sophones with his weak troops made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians again compelled to hide themselves within their walls, leaving all their Country to the spoil of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and trodden down by a Nation that they had not heard of, in less than fifty years after the death of Alexander, who fought to discover and subdue unknown Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia had been too little for a King of Macedon.

Very

which was indeed, the difficult he had, whercof not long after he died in Argos.

SECT. IV.

How Antigonus, the Son of Demetrius, delivered Macedon from the Gauls. How Pyrrhus won the Kingdom of Macedon from Antigonus.

THE virtue of Sophones, being too weak to defend the Kingdom of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him against Bel-gus, failing him in his attempts against Brennus;
the Macedonians were no less glad to submit themselves unto the government of Antigonus, than they had been formerly desirous to free themselves from the impotent rule of his Father Demetrius. His coming into the Country with an Army, Navy, and Treasure becoming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driven to use against the Barbarians, only those forces which he brought with him, having none other than good wishes of the Macedons to take his part.
Brennus with the main strength of his Army, was gone to spoil the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, having left no more behind him, than he thought necessary to guard the borders of Macedon and Pan-nonia; which were about fifteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of their fellows; and therefore sent unto Antigonus, offering to sell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceranus
he had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse.
Antigonus was unwilling to weaken his reputation by condescending to their proud demands: yet he judged it unfit to exasperate their furious chol-er, by uncourteous words or usage, as Ceranus had over-fondly done. Wherefore he entertained their Ambassadors in very loving and sumptuous manner, with a royal feast: wherein he exposed to their view such abundance of malleable gold and silver, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with sight of the vessels, wherein it was served. He thought hereby to make them understand how great a Prince he was, and how able if need required, to wage a mighty Army.

To which end, he likewise did shew unto them his Camp and Navy, but especially his Elephants.
But all this bravery served only to kindle their greedy appetites; who seeing his ships heavily laden, his Camp full of wealth, and ill fortified, himself (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage, inferior unto the Gauls, thought all time lost wherein they suffered the present opportunity to spend the riches, which they accounted assuredly their own. They returned therefore to their companions with none other news in their mouths, than of spoil and purchase: which tale carried the Gauls head-long to Antigonus his Camp, where they expected a greater booty, than the victory over Ceranus had given to Belgus. Their coming was terrible and sudden; yet not so sudden but that Antigonus had notice of it, who disdaining the courage of his own men, dilloved somewhat before their arrival, and conveyed himself with his whole Army and Carriage, into certain woods adjoining, where he lay close.

C c c

The

The Gauls, finding his Camp forsaken, were not hasty to pursue him, but full to ransacking the empty Cabins of the Soldiers, in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched every place in vain, angry at their lost labour, they marched with all speed towards the Sea-side, that they might fall upon him, whilst he was busy in getting his men and Carriages a ship-board. But the success was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terror which they had brought upon Antigonus, they were to careles of the Seamen, that without all order, they fell to the spoil of what they found on the shore, and in such tipsy as lay on ground.

Part of the Army had left Antigonus where he lay in covert, and had saved it self by getting aboard the Fleet: in which number were some well-experienced men of War: who discovering the much advantage offered unto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies, took courage, and encouraged others to lay mainly hold upon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Soldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gave to brave a charge upon the disordered Gauls, that their contemptuous boldness was thereby changed into sudden fear, and they, after a great slaughter, driven to cast themselves into the service of Antigonus.

The fame of this Victory caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters, to re-entertain their ancient belief of the Macedonian valour: by which the terrible and irresistible oppressors of so many Countries were overthrown.

To speak more of the Gauls in this place, and to show how about the times, three Tribes of them passed over into Asia the less, with their Wars and Conquests there; I hold it needless; the victorious Armies of the Romans tanning them hereafter in the Countries which now they wan, shall give better occasion to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howsoever the success of Antigonus got him reputation among the barbarous peoples; yet his own Soldiers, that without his leading had won this Victory, could not thereupon be persuaded to think him a good man of War: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the service, wherein his conduct was no better than creeping into a Wood.

This (as presently will appear) was greatly helpful unto Pyrrhus: though as yet he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affairs in Italy stood upon hard terms, had sent unto Antigonus for help: not without threats in case it were denied. So was he sure to get either a supply, whereby to continue his War against the Romans; or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italy under colour of making his word good, in seeking revenge. The threats which he had used in bravery, were needfully forced him at his return into Epirus to put in practice.

He brought home with him eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse: an Army too little to be employed by his restless nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had means to keep in pay. Therefore he fell upon Macedon, intending to take what spoil he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this business, two thousand of Antigonus his Soldiers revolted unto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, received him. Such fair beginnings casily persuaded the courage of this daring Prince to sit upon Antigonus himself, and to hazard his fortune in trial of a battle, for the whole Kingdom of Macedon.

It appears, that Antigonus had no desire to fight with this hot Warriour; but thought it the wisest way, by protracting of time, to weary him out of a fruit passage, and charged him in the rear: where in were the Gauls and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength; a manifest proof that he was in retreat. The Gauls very bravely sustained Pyrrhus his impressions; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slain) after a sharp fight: wherein it seems that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the front, and not advancing to their succour, took away their courage, by deceiving their expectation. The Captains of the Elephants were taken from after; whose finding themselves exposed to the same violence that had consumed so many of the Gauls, yielded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort; which emboldened Pyrrhus to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was matter of extreme difficulty (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had seen so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discovered to well their affections, that he adventured to draw near in person, and exhort them to yield. Neither the common Soldiers, nor any Leader refused to become his followers. All forsook Antigonus, a few horsemen excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and his money enough to entertain a greater power, had he known where to levy it. But whilst he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gauls into his service; whereby he might repair his loss: Pholom, the Son of Pyrrhus, came upon him, and easily defeating his weak forces, drove him to flee from the parts about Macedon, to those Towns afar off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the World, and made himself a King.

This good success revived the spirits of the Epirots, and caused him to forget all sorrow of his late misfortunes in the Roman War: so that he sent for his Son Helenus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come over into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselves.

SECT. V.

How Pyrrhus assailed Sparta without success. His enterprise upon Argos, and his death.

Pyrrhus had now conceived a great hope that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing that in open fight he had vanquished the Gauls, and beaten Antigonus, and won the Kingdom of Macedon. There was not in all Greece, nor indeed in all the Lands that Alexander had won; any Leader of such name and worth, as deserved to be set up against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might do what he pleased.

He raised therefore an Army, consisting of five and twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and four and twenty Elephants; pretending War against Antigonus, and the giving liberty to those Towns in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subjection; though it was easily discovered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some design more important than War against a Prince already vanquished, and almost utterly dejected. Especially the Lacedemonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings being expelled out of his Country, had betaken himself to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdom. This promise was made in secret: neither would Pyrrhus make show of any displeasure that he bare unto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to have two of his own younger Sons trained up in that City, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, even till he entered upon Laconia, where presently he demanded himself as an open enemy; executing himself and his former dissembling words with a just; That he followed herein the Lacedemonian custom, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedemonians, to deal in like sort with others, when in the time of their greatness, they fought to oppress: but now they complained of that, as failed in Pyrrhus, whilst they always practised in wisdom, till it made them discontented, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Nevertheless, they were not wanting to themselves in this dangerous extremity. For the old Men and Women laboured in fortifying the Town; causing such as could bear arms to reserve themselves to fight against the assault: which Pyrrhus had unwisely deferred, upon assurance of prevailing.

Sparta, was never fortified before this time, otherwise than with armed Citizens: soon after this (it being built upon uneven ground, and for the most part, hard to approach) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with Walls, at the present only trenches were cast, and barricadoes made with Caris, where the entrance fenced most easily. Three days together it was assailed by Pyrrhus exceeding fiercely, and no life finally defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserved the Town the first day; wherein the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Soldiers more mindful of saving the person of their King, than of breaking into the City, though already they had torn in under the Barricades. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captains got into Sparta, with a good strength of men; and Arcus the King returned out of Crete (where he had been helping his friends in War) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his own Country stood, until he was almost at home. These few kindle in Pyrrhus a desire to prevail against all impediments. But the third days work showed how great his error had been, in forbearing to assault the Town at his first coming. For he was so manfully repelled, that he saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Army, though not strong enough to meet the Enemy in plain field, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrrhus doubtful what way to take, being diversly affected, by the difficulty of his enterprise in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilst he was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inviting him thither; with promise to deliver that City into his hands.

Civil Dissention raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of several Factions to call in Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the coming of these two Princes taught the Citizens wit, and made them diligent to rid their hands of such powerful allies, as each of the two Kings pretended himself to be. Antigonus told the Argives, that he came to save them from the tyranny of Pyrrhus; and that he would be gone, if they needed not his help. On the other side, Pyrrhus would needs persuade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them free from Antigonus; advising in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

The Argives took small pleasure in hearing the Fox and the Lion at strife, which if they should keep the Chieftains from his enemy; and the more they prayed them both to divert their power some other way. Herunto Antigonus readily condescended, and gave hostages to assure his word: as if he was the weaker, and stood in need of good will. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promise: hostages he would give none to his inferiors, especially meaning death. This made them suspect his purpose to be, such as indeed it was. Yet he less regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of assurance, by giving such a bond as he intended to break at the next morning.

It was concluded that a Gate of the City should be opened by night unto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Army without any tumult entered the City: till the Elphs with their Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to pass the Gate. The taking off, and sitting, on again of those Towers, with the trouble thereof, prolonging, did both give alarm to the City, and some leisure to take order for defence, before so many were entered as could fully matter it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindered the Gauls (that had the Vant guard) being ignorant of the ways in the dark night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much advantage, by their knowledge of every by passage; and setting upon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great loss and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore understanding by the confused noise, and unusual stirrings of his own men, that they were in distress, ordered the City in person, to take order for their relief, and assurance of the place. But the darkness, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, until break of day. Then began he to make his passage by force, and to far prevailed, that he got into the Market place. It is said, that seeing in that place the image of a Wolf and a Bull, in such posture as if they had been combatant, he called to mind an Oracle, which threatened him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolf: and that hereupon he made retreat.

Indeed, the coming of Antigonus to the relief, the disorder and confusion of his own men, with divers ill accidents, gave him reasonable cause to have retired out of the City; though the Wolf and Bull had been away. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gave back, so did others thrust forward; and the Ar- gives pressing hard upon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retreat with his own sword. The tops of the houses, were covered with women, that stood looking on the fight. Among these was one, that saw her own Son in dangerous case fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore she took a tile-stone, or slate, and threw it so violently down on the head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to the ground astonished with the blow; and lying in that case, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the restless ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdom of Macedon to Antigonus, who forthwith possessed the Army, the body, and the children of his Enemy. The body of Pyrrhus had honourable burial, and was given by Antigonus unto Helenus his Son; which young Prince he graciously sent home into his Father's Kingdom of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdom of Macedon; the posterity of Seleucus, reigned over Asia and Syria; and the house of Ptolemy had quiet possession of Egypt: until such time as the City of Rome, swallowing all up digested these, among other Countries, into the body of her own Empire.

CHAP. I.

Of the first Punick War.

SECT. I.

A discussion of that Probleme of Livie; Whether the Romans could have resisted the Great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman souldier, was of equal valour to the English.

AT Question handled by Livie, Whether the Great Alexander could have prevailed against the Romans, if after his Eastern Conquest, he had bent all his Forces against them, hath been, and is the subject of much dispute; which (as it seems to me) the arguments on both sides do not so well explain, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath given of the Roman power in his days. For if he, a Commander (in Hannibal's judgment) inferior to Alexander, though to none else, could with a small strength of men and little store of money, or of other needful helps in War, vanquish them in two Battels, and endanger their Estate, when it was well settled, and held the best part of Italy under a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander have done, that was abundantly provided of all which is needful to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of employment, coming upon them before their Dominion was half so well settled? It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more then thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse (as indeed, at his first passage into Asia, he carried over not many more) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base effeminate Asiatics. But he that considers the Armies of Perdiccus, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolemy, Antigonus and Lysimachus, with the actions by them performed, every one of which (to omit others) commanded only some fragment of this dead Emperours power, shall easily find that such a reckoning is far short of the truth.

It were needless to speak of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of Battery, and the like: of all which the Macedonian had abundance; the Roman having nought, save men and arms. As for Sea-forces, he that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punick War, were trained in the rudiments of Navigation; sitting upon the shoar, and beating the land with poles, to practise the stroke of the Oar, as not daring to launch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceive how far too weak they would have proved in such services.

Now for helpers in War; I do not see why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deferre to be laid in balance against those parts of Italy, which the Romans held in ill-assured subjection. To omit therefore all benefit that the Eastern World, more wealthy, indeed, than valiant, could have afforded unto the Macedonians: let us only conjecture, how the States of Sicily and Carthage, nearest neighbours to such a quarrell (had it hapned) would have stood affected. The Sicilians were for the most part Grecians; neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily have submitted themselves unto him that ruled all Greece besides them. In what terms they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shall appear anon. Sure it is, that Alexander coming into those parts, would have brought excessive joy to them that were fain to get the help of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his subjects. As for the Carthaginians, if Agabates the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his own besieged City, could by adventuring to fall into Africk, put their Dominion, yea, and Carthage it self, in extrem hazard; shall we think that they would have been able to withstand Alexander? But why do I question their ability, seeing that they sent Embassadors, with their submission, as far as Babylon, ere the War drew near them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some other few Italian friends (of which yet there were none that forsook them not, at some time, both before and after this) have opposed their valour and good military discipline, against the power of all Countreys to them known, if they would have made resistance. How they could have sped well, in undertaking such a match; it is unsafe to find in discourse of humane reason. It is true, that virtue and fortune works wonders; but it is against cowardly fools, and the unfortunate; for whosoever contends with one too mighty for him, either must excel in these, as much as his enemy goes beyond him in power; or else must look both to be overcome, and to be cast down so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and virtue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman or the Macedonian were in those days the better Soldier, I will not take upon me to determine: though I might without partiality, deliver mine own opinion, and prefer that Army, which followed not only Philip and Alexander, but also Alexander Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of War, before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did find forth. Concerning fortune, who can give a rule that shall all ways hold? Alexander was victorious in every Battle that he fought: and the Romans in the issue of every War. But forasmuch as Livie hath judged this a matter worthy of consideration; I think it a great part of Rome's good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italy: where in three years after his death, the two Roman Consuls, together with all the powers of that State, were surprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yield up their arms. We may therefore permit Livie to admire his own Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captains of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers: that the same conceit should blind our judgment, we cannot permit without much vanity.

Now in deciding such a controversy, me-thinks it were not amiss, for an English-man, to give such a sentence between the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being chosen Arbitrators) between the Athenians and Argives; that they should give a piece of Land; saying, that it belonged unto neither of them, but unto the Romans themselves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman were the best Warriour? I will answer, The English-man. For it will soon appear to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nations in War, that they were performed by no advantage of weapon; against no savage or unmanly people; the enemy being far superior unto us in number, and all needful provisions, yea, as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of War.

In what sort Philip won his Dominion in Greece;

what manner of men the Persians and Indians were, whom Alexander vanquished; as likewise of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, against such arms as it commonly encountered: any man, that hath taken pains to read the foregoing story of them, doth sufficiently understand. Yet was this Phalanx never, or very seldom, able to stand against the Roman Armies; which were embattelled in to excellent a form; as I know not whether any Nation besides them have used, either before or since. The Roman weapons were likewise, both offensive and defensive, were of greater use than those with which any other Nation hath served, before the fiery instruments of Gunpowder were known. As for the enemies with which Rome had to do, we find, that they which did over-march him in numbers, were as far over-matched by her in weapons; and that they of whom she had little advantage in arms, had as little advantage of her in multitude. This also (as Plutarch well observeth) was a part of her happiness; that she was never over-laid with two great Wars at once.

Hereby it came to pass, that having at first increased her strength by accession of the Sabines; having won the State of Alba, against which she adventured her own self, as it were in wager, upon the heads of three Champions; and having thereafter made her self Princess of Latium, she did afterwards by long War, in many ages, extend her Dominion over all Italy. The Carthaginians had well-near oppressed her: but her Soldiers were Mercenary; so that for want of proper strength, they were easily beaten at their own doors. The Ælians, and with them, all, or the most of Greece, assailed her against Philip the Macedonian he being beaten, did lend her his help to beat the same Ælians. The Wars against Antiochus, and other Asiatics, were such as gave to Rome small cause of boast, though much of joy: for those opposites were as bafe of courage, as the lands which they held were abundant of riches. Sicily, Spain, and all Greece, fell into her hands, by using her aid to protect them against the Carthaginian and Macedonian.

I shall not need to speak of her other conquests: it was easie to get more when she had gotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blench the reputation of so many famous victories: I am not so idle. This I say, That among all their Wars, I find not any, wherein their valour hath appeared comparable to the English. If my judgment seem overpartial, our Wars in France may help to make it good.

First therefore it is well known, that Rome (or perhaps all the world besides) had never any so brave a Commander in War as Julius Cæsar: and that no Roman Army was comparable unto that which served under the same Cæsar. Likewise, it is apparent, that this gallant Army, which gave plentiful proof of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Helvetian War, when it first entered into Gaul, was nevertheless utterly dishonoured, when Cæsar led it against the Germans. So that we may justly impute all that was extraordinary in the valour of Cæsar's men, to their long experience, under so good a Leader, in so great a War. Now let us in general compare with the deeds done by these best of Roman Soldiers, in their principal service; the things performed in the same Country, by our common English Soldiers, levied in haste, from following the Cart, or sitting on the shop-fall: so so shall we see the difference. Herein will we deal fairly, and believing Cæsar in relating the acts of the Romans. But will call the French Historians to witness, what actions were performed by the English. In Cæsar's time France was inhabited by the Gauls, a little people, but inferior to the French, by whom they were subdued; even when the Romans gave them assistance. The Country of Gaul was rent in sunder (as Cæsar witnesseth) into many Lordships: Some of which were governed by petty Kings, others by tyrannical rule, none ordered in such sort as might make it applicable to the nearest Neighbour. The actions were many, and violent: Not only in general throughout the whole Country, but between the petty States, yea in every City, and almost in every house. What greater advantage could a Conqueror desire? Yet there was a greater. Attilius, with his Germans, had over-run the Country, and held much part of it in subjection, little different from mere slavery: Yes, so often had the Germans prevailed in War upon the Gauls, that the Gauls (who had sometimes been the better Soldiers) did hold themselves no way equal to those daily Invaders. Had France been so prepared unto our English Kings, Rome is told by this time, and long ere this now, would have been ours.

But when King Edward the third began his War upon France, he found the whole Country settled in obedience to one mighty King; a King whose reputation abroad, was not less than his puissance at home; under whose ensign, the King of Jerusalem did serve in person; at whose call the Genoises, and other Neighbour States, were ready to take arms; finally, a King unto whom one (a) Prince gave away his Dominion, for love; (b) another sold away a goodly City and Territory for money. The Country lying so open to the Romans and being so well fenced against the English; it is not worthy, nor who prevailed most therein (for it were vanity to match the English purchases with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gave the greater proof of military virtue. Cæsar himself doth witness, that the Gauls complained of their own ignorance in the Art of War, and that their own hardness was overmatched by the skill of their enemies. Poor men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of Battery, raised and planned against their Walls, as more than humane works. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Romans, than that the Germans, a naked people, but valiant, as any under the Sky, are commonly put to the work by small numbers of Spaniards?

Besides all this, we are to have regard of the great difficulty that was found, in drawing all the Gauls, or any great part of them, to one head, that with joint forces they might oppose their assailants: As also the much more difficulty of holding them long together. For hereby it came to pass, that they were never able to make use of opportunity: But sometimes compelled to fight for their fellows; and sometimes driven to give or take Battle upon such disadvantage, as for least their Companies should fall aunder: As indeed, upon any little disaster, they were ready to break, and return every one to the defence of his own. All this, and (which was little less than all this) great odds in weapon gave to the Romans the honour of many gallant Victories. What such help? Or what other worldly help, than the golden mettle of their Soldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of War? Yea, did they not think themselves there in our superiors? Were they not in Arms, in Hosts, and in all Positions, exceedingly beyond us? Let us hear what a French writer saith of the inequality that was between the French and English, when their King Jehan was ready to give the order upon the Black Prince, at the Battle of JEAN POISSIEUX. Jehan had all advantages over Edward, both of number, force, French Country, and command; which is commonly a consideration of no Edward's interest in worldly affairs; and whilst WARD, the Count of Artois his husband (effected then the best of Europe) with his greatest and wisest Captain, Joan his wife would. And what could he more?

It is not to trouble a Roman Antiquary to find in these examples their History, the example of a King, brought prisoner to the Romans, by an Army of Eight Thousand, which was surrounded with Forty Thousand, better appointed, and no less expert Warriours. This I am sure of, that neither Syphax the Numidian, nor his Soldiers, rightly terms them, nor their cowardly Kings, Antiochus and Genius, are worthy patterns. All that have read of Cæsar and Agincourt, will bear me witness, that I do not allege the Battle of Poitiers, for lack of other, as good examples of the English Virtue. The proof whereof hath left many a hundred better marks in all quarters of France, than ever did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute their Victories of ours to the long bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Cross-bow: My answer is ready; that in all these respects, it is also (being drawn with a strong Arm) superior to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more use. The Gun and the Cross-bow are of like force, when discharged by a Boy, or Woman, as when by a strong man: Weakness or sickness, or a fore finger makes the long Bow unserviceable. More particularly, I say, that it was the custom of our Ancestors, to shoot for the most part, point blank: And so shall he perceive, that will note the circumstances of almost any one Battle. This takes away all objection: For between two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of Arrows, or two at the most, can be delivered before they close. Neither is it in general true, that the long Bow reaches farther, or that it pierces more strongly than the Cross-bow: But this is the rare effect of an extraordinary arm; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall ask, how then came it to pass, that the English won so many great Battles, having no advantage to help him? I may, with best commendation of modesty, refer him to the French Historian; who relating the victory of our men at Crevaux; where they passed a Bridge in face of the Enemy, with these words: The English comes with a conquering bravery, such that was accustomed to every effort without any stay: He forthwith on guard placed, was on the Bridge to keep the passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Author, where he tells how the Ytians, being invaded by Charles the Eighth, King of France, thought of good policy to apparel a Thousand and five Hundred of their own men in English Callicocks; hoping that the very sight of the English Red Cross, would be enough to terrify the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Amilius, report wonders of our Nation :) the propolition on which first I undertook to maintain : That the military virtue of the English, prevailing against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred to that of the Romans, which was assisted with all advantages that could be desired. It is demanded, why then did not our Kings finish the Conquest, as Cæsar had done? My answer may be (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the Race of Æacide, of whom the old Poet Ænnius gave this note; Bellipotentis sunt magis quam sapientiores : They were more Warlike than politic. Whoso notes their proceedings, may find, that none of them went to work like a Conquerour, save only King Henry the fifth; the course of whose Victories it pleased God to interrupt by his death. If another question is the more easily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the Conquest of Gaul before the time of Cæsar? Why not after the Macedonian War? Why not after the third Punic, or after the Numantine? At all these times they had good leisure : And then especially had they both leisure and fit opportunity, when under the conduct of Marius, they had newly vanquished the Cimbri, and Tuiones, by whom the Country of Gaul had been pitiously wasted. Surely, the words of Tully were true : that with other Nations the Romans fought for Dominion, with the Gauls for preservation of their own safety.

Therefore they attempted not the Conquest of Gaul, until they were Lords of all other Countries, to them known. We on the other side, held only the one half of our own Island; the other half being inhabited by a Nation (unless perhaps in wealth and numbers of men somewhat inferior) every way equal to our selves; a Nation anciently and strongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard enemy to us. So that our danger lay both before and behind us. And the great danger at our backs; where commonly we felt, always we feared, a stronger Invasion by Land, than we could make upon France, transporting our Forces over Sea.

It is usual with men, that have pleased themselves in admiring the matters which they find in ancient Histories : To hold it a great injury done their judgment, if any take upon him, by way of comparison, to extol the things of latter ages. But I am well persuaded, that as the divided virtue of this Island, hath given more noble proof of it self, than under too worthy a Leader, that Roman Army could do, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Cæsar a Monarch; so hereafter, by Gods blessing, who hath converted our greatest hindrance, into our greatest help, the enemy that shall dare to try our forces, will find cause to wish, that avoiding us, he had rather encountered as great a puissance as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying aside comparisons, we return to the rehearsal of deeds done; wherein we shall find, how Rome began, after Pyrhus had left Italy, to strive with Carthage for Dominion, in the first Punic War.

SECT. II.

The estate of Carthage before it entred into War with Rome.

THE City of Carthage had stood above six Hundred years, when first it began to contend with Rome for the mastery of Sicily. It forewent Rome one Hundred and fifty years in antiquity of foundation: But in the honour of great achievements, it excelled far beyond this advantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion in Africa it self, from the West of Cyrene, to the streights of Hercules, about one Thousand and five Hundred miles in length, where in stood three Hundred Cities. It had subjected all Spain, even to the Pyrenean Mountains, together with all the Islands in the Mediterranean Sea, to the West of Sicily; and of Sicily the better part. It flourished about seven Hundred and thirty years, before the destruction thereof by Scipio: Who, besides other spoils, and all that the Souldiers reserved, carried thence four Hundred and seventy Thousand weight of Silver, which make of our money (if our pounds differ not) fourteen Hundred and ten Thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious City ran the same fortune, which many other great ones have done, both before and since. The ruine of the goodliest pieces of the World fore-shews the dissolution of the whole.

About one Hundred years after such time as it was cast down, the Senate of Rome caused it to be re-built : And by Gracchus it was called Junonia : It was again and again abandoned and re-peopled, taken and retaken; by Geisericus the Vandal, by Belisarius under Justinian, by the Persians, by the Egyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The fear thereof was exceeding strong: And while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, invincible. For the Sea compassed it about, saving that it was tied to the Main by a neck of Land, which passage had two miles and more of breadth (Aprian faith, three miles and one furlong) by which we may be induced to believe the common report, that the City it self was above twenty miles in compass; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to have been twice as great.

It had three Walls without the Wall of the City; and between each of those, three or four Streets, with Vaults under ground, of thirty foot deep, in which they had place for three Hundred Elephants, and all their food : Over these they had Stables for four Thousand Horses, and Granaries for their provender. They had all lodgings in the Streets, between these out-walls, for four Thousand Horse-men, and twenty Thousand Foot-men, which (according to the discipline used by those of Cleane) never pelted the City. It had towards the South part, the Castle of Byssa, to which Scipio gave two and twenty furlongs in compass, that make two miles and a half. This was the fame piece of ground which Dido obtained of the Lybians, when the goat leave to buy only so much Land of them, as the could compass with an Ox hide. On the West-side it had also the Salt-Sea, but in the nature of a standing pool; for a certain arm of Land, faltned to the ground, on which the City stood, stretched it self towards the West-centre, ment, and left but seventy foot open for the Sea to enter. Over this standing-Sea was built a moit sumptuous temple, having their Ships and Gallies riding under it.

The form of their Common-wealth resembled that of Sparta; for they had titulary Kings, and the Aristocratical Power of Senators. But (as Regius well observeth) the people in later times usurped too great authority in their Councils. This confusion in Government, together with the trust that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forcible causes of their ruine, were their avarice and their cruelty. (a) Their avarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinary Tributes) the one (b) half of the fruits of the Earth; and in conferring of great Offices, not upon gentle and merciful persons, but upon those who would best tyrannize over the people, to augment their treasures. Their cruelty appeared, in putting them to death without mercy, who had offended through ignorance: the one of these rendered them odious to their Vassals, whom it made ready upon all occasions, to revolt from them: the other did break the Spirits of their Generals, by presenting in the heat of their actions abroad, the fear of a cruel death at home. Hereby it came to pass, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian Forces, after some great loss received, have desperately cast themselves, with all that remained under their charge, into the throat of destruction; holding it necessary, either to repair their losses quickly, or to ruin all together : and few of them have dared to manage their own best projects, after that good form, wherein they first conceived them, for fear lest the manner of their proceeding should be mis-interpreted : It being the Carthaginian Rule, to crucify, not only the unhappy Captain, but even him, whose bad counsel had prosperous event. The faults, wherewith, in general, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians, I may be said to be these; lust, cruelty, avarice, craft, unfaithfulness, and perjury. Whether the Romans themselves were free from the same crimes, let the tryal be referred unto their actions. The first league between Carthage and Rome, was very ancient : having been made the year following the expulsion of Tarquinius. In that league the Carthaginians had the superiority, as imposing upon the Romans the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so much as have trade in some part of Africa, nor suffer any Ship of theirs to pass beyond the headland, or cape, then called the fair promontory, unless it were by force of tempest : whereas on the other side, no Haven in Italy, was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second league was made long after, which (howsoever it hath passed) Livy to say, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreaty ; was more strict than the former : prohibiting the Romans to have trade in any part of Africa, or in the Island of Sardinia.

Now Armies being compounded. And it is the Free-man, and not the Slave, that hath courage, and the sense of shame deferred by cowardice. How free the English Youth have been in times, not long past, Fortin hath shewed in his praise of our Countrymen Lewis and Gentry more fervile. For since the excessive bravery and vain experience of our Grandees hath taught them to raise their Reins, since Court-Lies, and dismembering of Manors, the Court Baron, and the Principals of the Gentry of England, have been dis-couraged, the Tenants having payed unto their Lords their rack Rent, owe them now no service at all, and (perchance) as little love. Liv. Dec. 1. 7.

By these two Treaties it may appear, that the Carthaginian had an intent not only to keep the Romans (as perhaps they did other People) from getting any knowledge of the State of Africa; but to counterpane and uphold them, in their troubling all Italy, whereby they themselves might have the better means to occupy all Sicily, whilst that Island should be delivred of Italian Incurours. Hereupon we find good cause of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crown of Gold, weighing twenty and five pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Sannites were overthrowen. But the little State of Rome prevailed after in Italy, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicily. For that mighty Army of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africa in Sicily, was only two Cities thence : many great Fleets were devoured by tempests; and howsoever the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their own valour, or by the assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repair their own losses, and take revenge upon those Invaders. But never were the People of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicily, than when the death of Asdrubalus the Tyrant, had left the whole Island in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilst the Carthaginians were busied in making their advantage of this good opportunity, Pyrhus, invited by the Tarentines and their fellows, came into Italy, where he made sharp War upon the Romans. These news were unpleasant to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtle Nation, easily forebaw, that the same bulle disposition which had brought this Prince out of Greece into Italy, would as easily transport him over into Sicily, as soon as he could finish his Roman War. To prevent this danger, they sent Mago Embassador to Rome; who declared in their name, that they were forced to hear what misadventure had befallen the Romans their good friends in this War with Pyrhus, and that the People of Carthage were very willing to assist the State of Rome, by sending an Army into Italy, if their help were thought needful, against the Epirians.

It was indeed the main desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrhus so hardly to his purpose in Italy, that they might at good leisure, pursue their business in Sicily : which caused them to make so goodly an offer. But the Romans were too high-minded; and refused to accept any such aid of their friend, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seem unable to stand by their own strength. Yet the message was taken lovingly, as it ought; and the former league between Rome and Carthage renewed; with covenants added, concerning the present business; that if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrhus, it should be with reservation of liberty, to assist the other, in case that Pyrhus should invade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrhus, using all means to found his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one upon every new occasion, changes his own purposes) yet Pyrhus found leisure to make a step into Sicily; whether though in fine he was neither better nor savor, yet he clean defeated the purposes of Carthage, leaving them, at his departure from thence, as far from any end, as when they first began.

So many disallers in an enterprise, that from the first first underraking had been so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well have induced the Carthaginians to believe, that an higher providence resisted their intentment. But their desire of winning that fruitful Island, was so inveterate, that with unwearied patience, they still continued in hope of so much the greater an Harvest, by how much their cost and pain therein buried had been the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses; and by force or practice, recovered in few years all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chief City of the Island, that so they might the better enable themselves to deal with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a Troop of Campanian Souldiers, that had served under Agathocles, being entertained within Messina as friends, and finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, took advantage of the power that they had to wrong; and with perfidious cruelty, slew those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the City, Lands, Goods, and Wives of those whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mamerines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that meer desperation of finding any that would approve their barbarous treachery, added rage unto their insolence. Having therefore not any other colour of their proceedings, than the Law of the stronger, they over-ran all the Countrey round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not only defend Messina against the Cities of Sicil Confederate, to wit, against the Syracusians, and others, but they rather wan upon them; yea, and upon the Carthaginians, exacting Tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long ere fortune turned her back to these Mamerines, the Syracusians was fain upon them; and finally, confining them within the walls of Messina, they also with a powerful Army besieged the City. It happened ill, that about the same time a contention began between the Syracusian Souldiers, then lying at Agara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Governors of the Common wealth; which proceeded so far, that the Army elected two Governours among themselves, to wit, Artemidorus and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his years excellently adorned with many virtues, although it was contrary to the policy of that State, to approve any election made by the Souldiers; yet for the great clemency used at his first entrance, he was by general consent established and made Governour. This Office he afterwards used as a Scale, thereby to climb to some higher degree, than rest content with his present preferment.

In brief, there was somewhat waning, whereby to strengthen himself within the City; and somewhat without it, that gave impediment to his obtaining, and life keeping of the place he fought, to wit, a powerful party within the Town, and certain mutinous Troops of Souldiers without, often and easily moved to sedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himself, he took to Wife the daughter of Lepines, a man of the greatest estimation and Authority among the Syracusians. For the second, leading out the Army to besiege Messina, he quartered all those companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the City, and leading the rest of his Horse and Foot unto the other side, as if he would have assaulted it in two several parts, he marched away under the covert of the Town walls, and left the Maimers to be cut in pieces by the afflicted: So returning home, and levying an Army of his own Citizens, well trained and obedient, he hastened again towards Messina, and was by the Mamerines (grown proud by their former victory over the Maimers) encountered in the Plains of Mylæum, where he obtained a most signal victory; and leading with him their commander captive in Syracuse, himself by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamerines, finding themselves utterly encircled, some of them resolved to give themselves to the Carthaginians, others to crave assistance of the Romans: to each of whom the several faction dispatched Embassadors for the very same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soon ready to lay hold upon the good offer: so that a Captain of theirs got into the Castle of Messina, whereof they that had sent for him gave him possession. But with a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to a good agreement, that this Captain, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of doors, and the Town reserved for other Masters.

These news did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Captain, as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Army to besiege Messina, as a Town that rebelled having once been theirs. Hieron the new-made King of Syracuse, (to gratifie his people incensed with the smart of injuries lately received) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entered into a league, for exterminating the Mamerines out of Sicil. So the Mamerines on all sides were closed up, within Messina: the Carthaginians lying with a Navy at Sea, and with an Army on the one side of the Town, whilst Hieron with his Syracusians lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger came Appius Claudius the Roman Consul, with an Army to the Streights of Sicil: which passing by night with notable audacity, he put himself into the Town, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart, signifying unto them that the Mamerines were now become Confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore he was come to give them protection, even by force of War, if reason would not prevail.

This message was utterly neglected; And so began the War between Rome and Carthage; wherein it will then be time to shew on which part was the Justice of the quarrel, when some actions of the Romans lately foregoing this, have been first considered.

SECT III.

The beginning of the first Punick War. That it was unjustly undertaken by the Romans.

When Pyrrius began his War in Italy, the City of Rhegium being well affected to Rome, and not only fearing to be taken by the Epirians, but much more distrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to seize upon it in that busy time, sought aid from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, consisting of four thousand Souldiers, under the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering at good leisure, the fact of the Mamerines committed in Messina (a City in Sicil, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no other way divided than by a narrow Sea, which severeth it from Italy) and rather weighing the greatness of the booty, than the odiousness of the villany, by which it was gotten, resolved finally, to make the like purchase, by taking the like wicked course. Considering therefore themselves with the Mamerines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; dividing the spoil, and all which that State had, among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate and people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the World made a more severe profession of justice, than they did during all the time of their growing greatness) resolved, after a while, to take revenge upon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italy by Pyrrius. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulness of their fact, hopeless of pardon) defended themselves with an obdurate resolution: yet in the end, the assailants forced them; and those which escaped the present fury, were brought bound to Rome, where, after the usual torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custom of the Countrey, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders, and the people of Rhegium were again restored to their former liberty and estates.

This execution of Justice being newly performed, and the fame thereof sounding honourably through all quarters of Italy: messengers came to Rome from Messina, desiring help against the Carthaginians, and Syracusians, that were in readiness to inflict the like punishment upon the Mamerines, for the like offence. A very impudent request it was, which they made: who having both given example of that villany to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with joint forces to make it good, do intreat the Judges to give them that assistance, which they were wont to receive from their fellow-thieves.

The Romans could not suddenly resolve, whether the way of honesty or of profit were to be followed; they ever more pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered, how contrary the course of succouring the Mamerines was to their former counsels and actions: seeing for the same offences they had lately put to torment, and to the Sword, their own Souldiers, and restored the oppressed to their liberty. Yet when they beheld the defection of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best part of Africk, of the Mediterranean Islands, of great part of Spain, and some part of Sicil itself; whilst all they feared, that Syracuse therein fortified (a City in beauty and riches, little at that time inferior to Carthage, and far superior to Rome itself) might become theirs; the safety of their own estate spake for these Mamerines: who, if they (driven to despair by the Romans) should deliver up Messina, with those other holds that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand between Carthage, and the Lordship of Sicil: for Syracuse itself could not, for want of succour; any longer subsist, if once the Carthaginians that were Masters of the Sea, did fallen upon that passage from the main Land. It was further considered, that the opportunity Messina was such, as would not only debar all succours out of the Continent, from arrival in Sicil;

but would serve as a Bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might have entrance into Italy, at their own pleasure.

These considerations of profit at hand, and of preventing danger, that threatened from afar, did prevail above all regard of honesty, that the Mamerines were admitted into Confederacy with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consul, presently dispatched away for Messina: into which he entered before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arrival; and less moved with his requiring them to desert from their attempt. For they did far exceed him in number of men; the whole Island was ready to relieve them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Town. All this Appius himself well understood: and against all this he thought the stiff metal of his Roman Souldiers a sufficient remedy. Therefore he resolved to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his coming was to fend them away from the Town; not to be beleagued by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficial to him, that the enemy lay encamped in such forts as one quarter was not well able to relieve another in distress. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, wherein he had wilfully cast his own mutinous followers not long before: only he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his own quarter, without help of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by unexpected falls, to surprize his trenches) arranged his men in order of Battle, wherewith he presented him. The Syracusians wanted not courage to fight; but surely he wanted good advice: else would he not have hazarded all his power against an enemy of whom he had made no trial, when it had been calie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his own Camp. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorn the beginning of his Reign. But he was well beaten, and driven to save himself within his trenches: by which loss, he learned a point of wisdom, that stood him and his Kingdom in good stead all the days of his life. It was a foolish desire of revenge, that had made the Syracusians so bulie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamerines.

Had Messina been taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse itself must have sought help from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mighty Cities) but a small stock, which it behooveth him to govern well: such another loss would have made him almost Bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake up his Camp; and retired home: intending to let them stand to their adventures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargain. The next day, Claudius perceiving the Sicilian Army gone, did with much alacrity of his Souldiers, give charge upon the Carthaginians; wherein he sped so well, that the enemy forsook both Field and Camp, leaving all the Countrey open to the Romans; who having spoiled all the Town, without resistance, intended to lay siege unto the great City of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoever they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes of attaining to greater matters, than at the first they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any form of terror in the City of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater losses than this, in which no more was lost than what had been prepared against um, and upon certain small Isles adjoining to the main Island: which they fortified, to secure the Trades that they had in the Silicians; like as the Portugals have done in the East-India, at Goa, Ormus, Molambay, and other places. But the Phœnicians stayed not there; for after they had once assured their defenses, they built the goodly City of Panormus, now called Palerma.

These we find were the Nations that inhabited the Isle of Sicil, before the War of Troy, and ere the Greeks in any numbers began to straggle in those parts.

It may perchance seem strange to the Reader, that in ancient Histories, he finds one and the same beginning of Nations, after the flood; and that the first planters in all parts of the World are said to be mighty and Giant-like men; and that, as Phœnicia, Aegypt, Lybia and Greece, had Heracles, Orestes, Antaw, Typhou, and the like; as Denmark had Starckaterus, remembered by Sæo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britania, and other Regions had Giants for their first Inhabitants: to this Isle of Sicil had her Lefrigones and Cyclopes. This discourse I could also reject for fained and fabulous, did not Aldus make us know, that the Zancusimmi, Emoni, Andakim, and Or of Bupus, with others, which sometimes inhabited the Mountains and Defarts of Maab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the races of Giants; and were it not that Tertullian, St. Augustine, Nicephorus, Procopius, Isidore, Pliny, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plutarch, and many other Authors, have confirmed the opinion: Yea, Vespasian, in his second Navigation into America, had reported that himself had seen the like men in those parts. Again, whereas the self-same is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their simplicity of life, their meanness, their feeding on Acorn and Roots, their poor cottages, the covering of their Bodies with the Skins of Beasts, their Hunting, their Arms, and Weapons, and their Warfare, their first passages over great Rivers and Arms of the Sea, upon Rafts of Trees tied together; and afterwards their making Boats first of Twigs and Leather, then of wood; first with Oars, and then with Sails; that they esteemed as Gods, the first finders out of Arts; as of Husbandry, of Laws, and of Policy: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all lived in the same newness of time, which we call Oldtime, and had all the same want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankind. For other teaching had they none, that were removed far off from the Hebrews, (who inherited the knowledge of the first Patriarchs) than that from variable effects they began, by time and degrees to find out the causes: from whence came Philosophy Natural; as the Moral did from disorder and confusion; and the Law from cruelty and oppression.

But it is certain, that the Age of Time hath brought forth strange and more incredible things, than the Infancy. For we have now greater Giants for vice and injustice, than the World had in those days, for bodily strength; for Cottages, and Houses of Clay and Timber, we have raised Palaces of Stones; we carve them, we paint them, and adorn them with Gold, in such sort that men are rather known by their Houses, than their Houses by them; we are fallen from two dishes to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunksness; from treading over of our Bodies with the Skins of Beasts, not only to Silk and Gold, but to the Skins of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will also take revenge of the excess, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies perierit, longiorque ævus, longiorque sibi fructus: Long time brought forth, longer time increased it, and a time longer than the rest, shall overthrow it.

SECT. II.

The Plantation of the Greeks in Sicil.

WHEN the first Inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicil: It happened, that one Thucelus a Greek, being driven upon that Coast by an Eastern wind, and finding true the commendations thereof, which had been thought fabulous, being delivered only by Poets, gave information to the Athenians of this his discovery, and proposed unto them the benefit of this easie Conquest, offering to become their guide. But Thucelus was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the English. Wherefore he took the same course that Columbus afterwards did. He over-laboured not himself in persuading the noble Athenians (who thought themselves to be well enough already) to their own profit, but went to the Calcedians, that were needy and industrious, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By these was built the City of Naxos, and a Colony planted of Athenians.

But the rest of the Greeks were wiser than our Western Princes of Europe: For they had no Pope, that should forbid them to occupy the void places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubœans, and landed in Sicil, (near unto that City, called afterward * Syracuse of which, that part only was then compassed with a wall, which the Æolians called Homothermus; the Greeks, Naxos; the Latins, Infusa. He with his Corinthians having overcome the Sicils, drove them up into the Country; and after a few years, their multitude increasing, they added unto the City of the Island, that of Acradina, Tyca, and Neopoli. So as well by the commodity of the double Port, capable of as many Ships, as any Haven of that part of Europe, as by the fertility of the Soil, Syracuse grew up in great haste, to be one of the goodliest Towns of the World. In short time the Greeks did possess the better part of all the Sea-coast; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themselves into the fairs and mountainous parts of the Island, making their Royal residence in Trinacria.

Port (was for the most part) environed with beautiful buildings; and that part which was without the City, was on both sides brack up and sustained with beautiful walls of Marble. The City of it self was one of the greatest of the World: for it had in compass (as Strabo reporteth) without the treble wall thereof, a hundred and eighty furlongs, which make of our miles about eighteen. It was compassed by three Cities (Strabo faith of five) to wit, Naxos, Acradina, Tyca, and Neopoli: of which greatness the ruins and foundations of the walls do yet witness. After such times as the Doree of Poloponnesus had driven out the Sicilians, this goodly City for a long time became the seat of Tyranny. The first whereof was Gela: The second, Hybla the elder. The third, Therapylus: The fourth and fifth, Plinthis the elder, and younger: The sixth, Dion: The seventh, Agathis: The eighth, Pyræus: The ninth, Hiero the younger: The tenth and last, Therapylus, who being slain at Leontium, at length the Romans conquered it under the conduct of Marcellus.

Some seven years after the arrival of Archias, the Calcedians, encouraged by the success of the Corin-

Corinthians, did assail, and obtain the City of Leontium, built and possessed by the Sicils. In brief, the Greeks won from the Sicils, and their Associates, the Cities of Catanæ and Hybla, which in honour of the Megarians that for it, they called Megara.

About five and forty years after Archias had taken Syracuse; Antiphenus, and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Army into Sicil, and built Gela; whose Citizens, one Hundred and eight years after, did erect that magnificent and renowned City of Aggrigentum, governed according to the Laws of the Dorians.

The Syracusians also, in the seventieth year after their Plantation, did set up the City of Acra, in the Mountains; and in the nineteenth year of Cassius, in the Plains adjoining; and again in the Hundred and thirtieth year of their dwelling in Syracuse, they built Camerina: and soon after that, Enna, in the very Centre of the Island. So did the Cumani about the same time, recover from the Sicils the City of Zancle, which they had founded in the Straight between Sicil and Italy. They of Zancle, had been the founders of Himera.

Not long after this, Dorians the Lacedemonians built Heracleia, which the Phœnicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the neighbourhood of the Spartans, soon after invaded and ruined, though the fame were again ere long re-edified.

Selinus also was built by a Colony of Megara: and Zancle was taken by the Messinians; who having lost their own Country, gave the name thereof unto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest Cities in this Island.

†. III.

Of the Government and Affairs of Sicil before Dionysius his Tyranny.

THE most parts of the Cities in Sicil, were governed by the rule of the people, till such as Phalaris began to usurp the state of Aggrigentum, and to exercise all manner of Tyranny therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detestable Engine, gave an hollow Ball of Brass, wherein to inclose men, and scorch them to death: Praising his device with this commendation; that the noise of one tormented therein, should be like unto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gave a due reward to the Invenor; by causing the first royal to be made upon himself. He reigned one and thirty years, faith Enchiridion; others give him but sixteen: Howsoever it were, one Telenachus in the end, fell upon him with the whole multitude of Aggrigentum, and stoned him to death; by thereto animated by Zeno, even whilst the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confess some matter of conspiracy.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their liberty, and enjoyed it long, till Tello usurped the Government of the Common-wealth: At which time also Panæmus made himself Lord of Leontium; and Cleander of Gela: By one of the Citizens ruled seven years, was slain by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his Brother Hippocrates succeeded in his room, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle, of Messina, and of Leontium; whom with diverse others of the ancient Inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made War with the Syracusians, and, in the end, got from them by composition, the City of Camerina. But when he had reigned seven years, he was slain in a Battle against the Sicils, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their form of Government, from Popularis to Arifocratic; a preparation towards a Principality, whereto it was soon after changed. After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descender of the Rhadians, which together with the Creteans, had lived before, among other of the Greeks, rated themselves in Sicil) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former War, with notable success, became Lord of Gela. He, after his Matters dead, breaking the trust committed unto him by Hippocrates over his Children, and being in possession of Gela, took the occasion and advantage of a contention in Syracuse, between the Magistrates and the People. For coming with a great Army to the succour of the Government, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, (and indeed) the most famous, that ever governed the Syracusians. This change hapned in the second year of the threecore and twelfth Olympiad, wherein the better to establish himself, he took to wife the Daughter of Terillus, who had also usurped the State of Aggrigentum.

Now this Gelon, the Son of Dinomene, had three Brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Therapylus: to the first of which he gave up the City of Gela, when he had obtained the Principality of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts travelled in the strengthening, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Megarians that had moved a War against him, he overcame; the richer sort he brought unto Syracuse; and the people he sold for slaves. In like manner dealt he with other places upon the like occasion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Aggrigentines, having dispossessed Terillus of his City Himera; the Carthaginians were drawn into the quarrel by Anaxilus, Lord of Messina, Father-in-law to Terillus; and Gelon was also solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after diverse conflicts, the Carthaginians and other Africans, led by Amilcar, were overthrown by Gelon: And an Hundred and fifty Thousand of them left their Bodies in Sicil.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedemonians lent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Army pait the Hellens. He, for their relief having armed thirty Thousand Souldiers, and two Hundred Ships, refused nevertheless to send them into Greece, because they refused him the command of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or Land. So he used to their Embassadors only this Saying, That their Spring was withered; accounting the Army, by him prepared, to be the very flower of the Greek Nation.

The Carthaginians, after this great loss received, fearing the invasion of their own Country, sent to Gelon by their Embassadors, to desire peace, who grants it them on these conditions: That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their Children to Satan; that they should pay him two Thousand Talents of Silver, and present him with two armed Ships, in sign of amity. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two Thousand Talents, and the Ships for War, they sent unto Demetrius, Gelon Wife, a Crown, valued at an Hundred Talents of Gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The Wars ended, and Sicily in peace, Gelon beautified the Temples of the Gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloved and honoured of his Subjects, he left the world, and left for his successor his Brother Hiero, Philistus and Pliny report, That when his Body was burnt, according to the custom of that Age, a Dog of his, which always waited on him, ran into the fire, and suffered himself to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his Brother succeeded; a man Rude, Cruel, Covetous, and so Suspicious of his Brethren Polyseles, and Thrasylus, as he fought all means to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this, by the conversation he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the study of good Arts. Diverse qualities he had, as well with Theron of Agirgenium, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gave a notable overthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicily, fearing the favours which Gelon had prepared, to aid the Greeks against him. He also overthrew in battle Thrasylus, the Son of Theron, and thereby restored the Agirgenians to their former liberty. But in the end, he lost the love of the Syracusans; and after he had reigned eleven years, he left the Kingdom to his Brother Thrasylus, who became a most unjust and bloody Tyrant, than he himself enjoyed his Principality no longer than ten Months. For, notwithstanding the force of mercenary Soldiers, which he entertained for his Guards, he was beaten out of Syracuse by the Citizens; to whom, being belied in Acadina, he restored the Government, and was banished the Island. From whence he failed into Greece, where he died a private man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracusans recovered again their former liberty, as all the rest of the Cities did; after which they had never fought, had the Successors of Gelon inherited his virtue, as they did the Principality of Syracuse. For in all changes of Estates, the preservation ought to answer the acquisition. When a liberal, valiant, and advised Prince, hath obtained any new Signiory, and added it to that of his own, or exalted himself from being a private man to the dignity of a Prince, it becometh the Successor to maintain it by the same way and art, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blows, ere that she could cleanse her self of the Creatures and Lovers of Gelon) was now again become Mistress of her self, and held her self free, well-near threecore years, to the time of Dionysius, though she were in the mean while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her own, called Tindarus.

Now, to prevent the greatness of any one among them, for the future, they devised a kind of banishment of such among them, as were suspected, taking pattern from the Athenian Ostracism. They called this their new devised judgment of exile, Petalism, wherein every one wrote upon an Olive-leaf (as at Athen they wrote upon shells) the name of him, whom he would have expelled the City. He that had most suffrages against him, was banished for five years. Hereby in a short time, it came to pass that those of judgment, and beittable to govern the Common-weal, were, by the worst able, either supprest, or thrust out of the City. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could, seeking some place of more security, wherein to maintain themselves. And good reason they had to do so; seeing that there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerful and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not very long: For their necessity taught them to abolish it, and restore again the wisdom for unto the Government; from which, the Nobility having practiced to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being invaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Island, who had already taken Enna, and some other of the Grecian Cities, and overthrown the Army of the Agirgenians; the Syracusans sent Forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called Balcen. This their Captain made nothing so much halfe to find out Ducetius, against whom he was employed, as he did to flee from the Army he led, as soon as Ducetius presented him battle. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusans perished.

But making better choice among those whom they had banished, they levy other Troops: by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being beaten, submitted himself, and is constrained to leave the Island for a time. Yet it was not long ere he returned again, and built the City Callania on the Sea-side.

Ducetius being dead, all the Greek Cities did in a sort acknowledge Syracuse, Trinacria excepted; which also by force of Arms, in the fourcore and fifth Olympiad, they brought to reason.

But they do not long enjoy this their Superintendency. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppressed by them, seek aid from the Athenians, about the sixth year of the Peloponnesian War. In this suit they prevailed by the Eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, under the leading of Laches, and Charades. To this Fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one Hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captains, they invaded the Territories of the Syracusans, and their Partisans; wan and lost diverse places; took Megane; and, in the seventh year of the Peloponnesian War, lost it again. They also at the same time attempted Ephorus, but in vain. The fire of this quarrel took hold upon many Cities which did invade each others Territory with great violence. But when they had wearied themselves on all hands, and yet could see none issue of the War, the Leontines, without the advice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracusans, and were admitted into their society, with equal freedom. So the Athenians, who hoped to have gleaned themselves in Sicily, by the division and civil War, were disappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and fain to be gone with the broken remainder of their Fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custom of popular Estates) by taking revenge upon their own Commanders. So they banished Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and laid an heavy fine upon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable War, that ever was this, followed by the Greeks in Sicily: Which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines and Syracusans, in favour of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppressed the Egestans; and and they of Syracuse the Leontines, and the Catanians: Which was the ground of the War. For the Athenians undertook the protection of their old friends: And, in hatred of the Athenians, aid from Lacedaemon was sent to the Syracusans. The Lacedaemonians dealt plainly, having no other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to help a people of their own Tribe, that craved their succour, being in distress. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: For their preparations were too great, as discovered their intent to be none other, than the Conquest of the whole Island. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their own passions, that they would not believe their own eyes; which presented unto them a Fleet and Army, far greater than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the City of Athen had engaged all her power; as regarding not only the greatness of the enterprise, but the necessity of hatching it in a short space of time. For the Lacedaemonians (as hath already been shewed in due place) stood at that time in such broken terms of peace with Athen, as differed not much with open War. Wherefore it was thought necessary, either to spare cost in this Great Expedition, or altogether to forbear it: Which was like to be hindered by Wars at home, if their proceedings were slack abroad. And surely, had not the desire of the Athenians been over-passionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstain from so chargeable business, and to reserve their forces for a more useful use. But young Counsels prevailed against the Authority of Ancient men, that were more respectful of safety than of honour.

Of this business, mention hath been already made, in that which we have written of the Peloponnesian War. But what was there delivered in general terms, as not concerning the affairs of Greece, otherwise than by consequence, doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicily was like to have felt a great conversion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chief Commanders therein.

These had commission and direction, as well to succour the Segelians, and to reestablish the Leontines, cast out of their places by the Syracusans, as also by force of Arms, to subject the Syracusans, and all their adherents in Sicily, and compel them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their Supreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captains were sent off, with an Hundred and thirty Gallies, and five Thousand one Hundred Soldiers, besides the thirty Ship of burden, which transported their Victuals, Engines, and other munitions for the War: And these were Athenians, Mantineans, Rhodians and Candians: There were, besides these, six Thousand Megarians light-armed, with thirty Horsemen.

With these Troops and Fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuse to give them entry; but sell them victuals for their Money. From thence they sent to the Egestans, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the War, seeing for their sakes they had entered therein. But they found by their answers, that these Egestans were poor, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with false shews of Gold, having in all but thirty Talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians their ancient friends, and allied unto the Leontines, refused to truit them within their Walls. Hereupon Nicias advised to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or persuade them to an agreement with the Egestans; as likewise to see what discontents the Egestans could make; and to return again unto Greece, and not to waste Athen in needless War. Alcibiades, on the other side, would sollicite the Cities of Sicily to condiscord against the Syracusans and Selinuntines, whereby to force them unto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus he persuades them to assail Syracuse itself, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they surprize Catana; and there they take new counsel how to proceed. Thence they employed Nicias to those of Egesta, who received from them thirty Talents towards his charges; and one hundred and twenty Talents more there were of the spoils they had gotten in the Island. Thus the Summer being spent in idle consultations, and vain attempts, the Athenians prepare to assail Syracuse. But Alcibiades having been accused at home, in his absence, was sent for back by the Athenians to make his answer; and the Army was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtain a Landing place very near unto Syracuse, by this device.

They employ to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catana, whom they truit; and intrust him, to promise unto the Syracusans, that he would deliver into their hands all the Athenians within Catana. Hereupon the Syracusans draw thitherward with their best forces. But in the mean while, the Athenians, setting sail from Catana, arrive at Syracuse, where they land at fair ease; and fortifie themselves against the Town. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracusans had the loss; but the Athenians, wanting Horse, could not pursue their victory to any great effect. They then retire themselves, with a resolution to refresh their Army at Catana, for the Winter-season. From thence they made an attempt upon Megassus, hoping to have taken it by an intelligence, but in vain. For Alcibiades had discovered such as were Traitors within the City to the Megassians. This he now did, in despite of his own Citizens, the Athenians, because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to have put him to death, or to have banished him: whereof being assured by his friends, he took his way towards the Lacedaemonians, and to them he gave mischievous counsel against his Country. While this Winter yet lasted, the Syracusans sent Embassadors to Lacedaemon, and Corinth, for aid: as likewise the Athenian Captains in Sicily, send to Athen for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth year of the Peloponnesian War) the Athenians in Sicily sail from the Port of Catana to Megara, forsoke of the Inhabitants; from whence, forgoing the Country, they obtain some small victories over the struggling Syracusans: and at their return to Catana, they receive a supply of two hundred men at Arms, but without Horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Island from the Segelians, and other their adherents: They were all strengthened with a company of Archers, and with three hundred Talents in Money.

Hereupon they take courage, and incamp near Syracuse, upon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracusans, that failed to impeach their intrenchments.

intrenchments. They also received from their Confederates four hundred other Horse-men, with two hundred other Horse, to mount their men at Arms. Syracuse was now in effect blockt up, so as hardly any succours could enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians receive divers losses: among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slain.

In the mean while, Gyliphus and Pythias with the Lucanian and Corinthian forces, arrive, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selunians, join with them, so that with these and his own Troops, Gyliphus adventured to march over-land toward Syracuse. Syracuse send a party of their forces to meet him, and order the Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting him to come to the City upon a place of advantage. At the first encounter they had the better of their enemies, b: reason that the Syracusan Horse-men could not come to fight in those treights: b: soon after Gyliphus charging them again, brake them, and the Athenians Nicias to force him still within the Camp. Whereupon the Citizens of Gela of his affairs known, by his Letters to the Senate shewing, that without great supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be lost, together with the full Army remaining. These Letters received, the Athenians appoint two other Generals, Eumachos and Demophanes, to join with Nicias: they dispatch presently with five supplies; the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the mean while, Gylippus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians both by Sea and Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good success: but in conclusion, he took the Town of Fort, near unto Syracuse, the Promontory called Phormyrum; wherein the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their provisions. Notwithstanding which loss, and that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athen, by the Lacedaemonians; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the War in Sicily, and dispatch away Demofthenes with new succours. Demofthenes, in his way towards Sicily, encountered with Palaenches the Corinthian, with his Fleet: both the Captains being bound for Sicily, the one to succour Nicusa, the other Gylippus. The loss between them was in effect equal; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arrived to either, Gylippus and Ariston had assailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demofthenes arrived with threefore and thirteen Gallies, charged with Foot-men; and (blaming the sloath of Nicias) he invaded the Syracussians the same day that he arrived. But he made more haste than he had good speed, being shamefully beaten, and repulsed with great loss. Hereupon Demofthenes and Eurydamas determine to rise up from before Syracuse, and to fly to the succour of Athens: but Nicias disputed to that contrary, pretending that he had good intelligence within Syracuse, whereby he learned, that the Town could not long hold out.

Whatsoever Nicias his intelligence was; upon the arrival of a new supply into the Town, the Athenians had all consented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipse of the Moon, boding (as was thought) ill success, caused them to defer their departure. But this superfluous cost them dear. For the Syracusans, Lacedaemonians, and Corinthians with their ships and seventeen fail of Gallies, entered the great Port of Syracuse, where in the Athenians kept their Fleet, and whereon they had fortified themselves. The Athenians in the same Port encountered them with fourscore and five Gallies, commanded by Eurymedes: in which the Athenian Fleet was beaten, by the lesser number, and Eurymedes slain. Now, though it were so, that the Syracusans received the more loss by Land (for the fight was general) yet when the Athenians were beaten by Sea, in which kind they thought themselves invincible, they were wonderfully cast down. For it was well said of Gygius, to the Syracusan: When any People do find themselves vanquished in that manner of fight, and with both weapons, in which they persuade themselves that they exceed all others, they not only lose their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies sunk and wrackd, had seventeen taken, and posselt by the Enemy: and great labour and loss they defended the rest from being fired, having drawn them within a Palisade. The Syracusan Port, unadvantageously for it as contrary to a Sea-Port, to thrust ships into a freight room and corner, as it is to scatter Foot in a plain field against Horse, the one substituting by being at large, the other by close embattailing.

The *Syracusan*s, having now weakened the Athenian Fleet, resolve to imprint them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Haven, being about a Mile over, and there they came to Anchor; filling the ou-er with all manner of Vessels; which they man mozt strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies break through the Syracusan Fleet; and by a few single, because they were forc't to range the Fleet, and to divide the order of the Port. They therefore not only moved the sides of their Gallies together, and lay behind them again certain Ships, which served in the former War for Vindictals: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were sunk; or the chain, which joyned them to their fellows, broken; the Athenians might yet find themselves a second time, intrangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came on in form of a wedge, to break through, and cut in two, the *Syracusan*s had left within their Gallies, and in the middle of the wedge, a certain number of loose Gallies, which they sent out and suily. For where the way of any Vessel using Oar or Sails, is broken, and their speed foretold, they cannot force with any weight and violence the reluctance oppoling.

On the other side, the Athenians knew that they were utterly lost, except with an invincible resolution they could make their way, and break down this great Bridge of Boats, or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they resolve to hazard, with all their Shipping (to the number of one Hundred and Ten of all sorts) and with all the strength of their Land-Army, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the Bridge of Boats, did to disorder the Athenian Fleet; ere they came to force the Bridge, as albeit some few of them had broken through the chains, yet being top-sid with the Ships without, and assailed by other loose Gallies of the Syracusan Fleet,

Lars, which where purposely left at large in the Sea, they were either taken or sunk. Three great disadvantages, the Abenians had: the first, in fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a Sireight, they had no room to turn themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being incangled; the second, that having overpestered their Gallies with Souldiers, who used offensive Arms of Darts and Slings, they had not place upon the Decks to stretch their Arms; the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a passage, by which they might have their way running away. To be short, the fight was not yet begun, when confusion: the slaughter was on all sides; and the noise, and the cries, so loud and lamentable, that the voice of a Commander could be heard. But in the end, the Abenians many as survived, were beaten back to the Land, with lots of Threefoore of their Gallies, broken, and sunk, or abandoned. The Syracians did also lose Twenty of theirs, with Fyrtion, Commander of the Corinthians. The reit of the Abenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottom of the Port, saved themselves by the help and countenance of the Land-Army there fortified. In this desperate elate, the Abenian Commanders go to Council. Demophanes persuades them to furnish with archers, and send those few Gallies which remained; and while the others triumphing, and made secure by their prefernt victory, to fet upon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne Abenian. This was no ill counsell. For, as we have heard of many great Captains (yet, the greatest number of all that have been victorious), that have neglected the speedy prosecution of a beaten Enemy; so might we produce many examples of those, who having slept securely in the bosome of those succels, have suddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Army, and have thereby lost again all the honour and advantage formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth the counsel of Demophanes: Others say, that the Sea-men were weary. Whereupon Abenian Leaders to their Gallies, they their Confederate manner Landing to the Cities of their Alliance, till further more favourable fortune should call them thence. On the other side, Gylippus, and other the Lacedaemonian and Corinthian Captains, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracians to put themselves presently into the Field, and to stop all the passages, leading to those Cities of their Enemies, to which the Abenians might make retreat. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. And thus it was in some of our Commanders at Cadix, loit some of the Indian Fleet, and the spoils of many other neighbouring Cities. Hermocrates, the Syracians, finding it a loit, and perceiving his Countreymen to any halty prosecution, devised this good stratagem, whereby to gain time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, he should draw them willingly out. He sent two or three Horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to find Nicias, and after they had assured him, that they were of the Abenian faction) to give him advice not to march away from the present place, wherein he was fortified; alleging that the Abenians had lodged themselves in the City, and that he should not stirre out his Army, which could not long stay there, without passages and places of advantage, leading upwards to the Cities of their Allies. These tidings Nicias easily believed, and put off his journey to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearful then wife; and to them, every Thistle in the Field appears by night a man at Arms.

all appears by night a man at Aratus. The third day he came to the realities, and with all their baggage) they removed to the mountains and purged with the laudable out-cries of those that were sick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their Enemies Swords. The rest march away, to the number of Forty Thousand; and make their first passage by force, over the River of Asapara, notwithstanding the opposition of their marchers. But being every day charged in their marches, and in forraids, and provision of food, they grow weak and heartless: the Asaparians also grow towards the Mountain Lepas, by which they take to fall towards Casimera, and thereby force them to fall back again towards the Sea-coast, and to take what way they could: being unable to proceed in their journey intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and blind marches by Night; in which they were faint to endure, as having none other means to escape from the Enemy that would have been to have taken the way of a continual skirmishing. At length, in order, the Asaparians undertook the leading of the march, and the Demofthenes conducted the Rear. At the River Ermenis, Nicias takes the flart of a whole night's march, leaving Demofthenes to make the retreat: who being uncompanied, and overpelt with numbers, in the end renders himself. The conditions he obtained, were far better than he could have hoped for; and the faith of his enemies far worse than he expected. For he was afterward, with Nicias murdered in prison. The Army of Demofthenes being dissolved, he persuaded Nicias with the greater courage; who being sent to march upon the passage of the River Alphius, rendered himself to Gylippus, upon honest conditions. Gylippus sought to preserve him, and to have had the honour to have brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble Enemy to the Lacedaemonians; and who, at the overthrow which they received at Pylos by the Athenians, had saved the lives of the vanquished Demofthenes: as one that had done to the Lacedaemonians great hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Sicilians, was taken in the retreat, by all the art he had, from using any barbarous violence, after a noble victory. But the cruel and cowardly force, (cowardly and cruelty being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these brave Captains to be miserably murdered; one part of their Soldiers to be starved into loathsome Prisons; and the rest, sold for Slaves. This ended the Reign of Agis, the Sicilian War: which took place at the Reign of Agis, the four and Twentieth Day of May, in the Fourscore and Eleven Olympiad.

The Athenians, being beaten out of Sicily, the EGYPTIANS (for whose defence against the Syracuzans, this late war had been taken in hand) frayed the victorious Syracuzans, fought help from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered them- selves, and their City, as their Vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicily, yet considering the prosperity of the Syracuzans, and their late victories over the Athenians, they flayed a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse or accept the offer made unto them: for the Seleucians were frantically allied to the Syracuzans, as may appear by what is said. In the end the Senators of Carthage relented upon the enterprise, and (by a trick of their Phinix, wit) to separate the ro depart in safety, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himself, of the Duke of Anon his Brother, General of his Army, of the Queen Mother, and of divers Dukes and Marshals of France, he was set upon and broken in his March; spoiled of all that he had, and forced to save his life by flight; leaving the most of his Soldiers dead upon the place the Kings hand and faith warranting him to march away with Ensigns displayed and with all his Goods and Provisions, no whie availing him. It needs not therefore tenn drange, that an Peashen Tyrant should thus break his faith, fine Kings, professing Christianity, are bold to do the like, or command their Captain: to do it for them.

Dionysius after this great victory, took care to re-edifie Messina. Alago who layed in Sicil, to hold up the Carthaginians therein, was again beaten by Dionysius; who is also beaten by the Tauronemians. A new supply of Fourcote Thousand Soldiers is sent from Carthage to Alago, but these take Eggs for their Money, and make Peace with Dionysius, leaving the Sicilians in Tauronemium, to fluit for themselves: Whom Dionysius, after a long Siege, overcame, and gave their City to the Mercenary Soldiers.

He then past into Italy, obtained divers Victories there, brought the Rhegiens on their Knees, forced them to pay him one Hundred and Fourcote Thousand Crowns, to furnish him with Threecore Gallies, and put in an Hundred Pledges, for assurance of their future observance of Covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to perform unto them the Peace that they had so dearly bought, but that having taken from them their Gallies, he might Besiege them, and ruine them utterly, with the more ease. Now to the end he might not, without some colour, falsifie the faith that he had given to them, he pretended to want Victual for his Army, at such time as he seemed ready to depart out of Italy, and sent to them to furnish him therewith, promising to return them the like quantity at his coming home to Syracuse.

His resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, he would then make their refusal the cause of his quarrel; If they yielded to aid him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of Food, to endure a Siege any long time against him. For, to ruine them he had fully determined, at what price soever. And great reason he had to take revenge of them, if he had done so fairly, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his Reign, he desired them to bestow a Daughter of some of their Nobility upon him for a Wife, they answered that they had not any one fit for him, save the Hangmans Daughter. Princes do rather pardon ill deeds, than villanous words. Alexander the Great forgave many sharp Swords, but never any sharp Tongues; no, though they told him but truly of his errors. And certainly, it belongs to those that have warrant from God, to reprehend Princes; and to name elfe, especially in publick.

It is said, that Henry the Fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his over-bold and biting taunts, that he used against him before Amiens, than for his conspiracy with the Spaniards or Savoyans. For he had pardoned 10000 of such as had gone farther, and drawn their Swords against him. The contentious words that Sir John Parre used of our late Queen Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfeited letter of the Romish Priest produced against him. So fared it with some other, greater than he, that thereby ran the fame, and a worse fortune, soon after.

To be short, he made them know new Bread from old. He assaulted their Town on all sides, which he continued to do Eleven Months, till he won it by force. He used his Victory without mercy, specially against Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other Wars he made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and razing of this City; and those with variable success. For, as in one encounter he flew Mago, with Ten Thousand Africans: So the Son of Mago beat him, and slew his Brother Lepimus, with Fourteen Thousand of his Soldiers. After which he bought his Peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the advice of Prophecy and Adversity, as all Kings and States do.

When he had Reigned Eight and Thirty Years, he died: Some say in his Bed, peaceably, which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruel man he was, and a faithles; a great Poet, but a foolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his Tyranny, he gave order to have him slain, or sold for a Slave. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parafites therefore filed his cruelty, The hate of evil men; and his lawless slaughters. The ornaments and effects of his justice. True it is, that flatterers are a kind of Vermin, which poison all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worstifed and valiantest men do: And I wonder not at it, for it is a World: As our Saviour Christ hath told us, The World will love her own.

To this Dionysius, his Son of the same name succeeded, and inherited both his Kingdom and his Vices. To win the love of the People, he pardoned, and released out of Prison, a great number of Persons, by his Father lockt up and condemned. Withall, he remitted unto his Citizens divers payments, by his Father imposed upon them. Which done, and thereby hoping that he had fastned unto himself the Peoples affections; he cast off the Sheeps skin, and put on that of the Wolf. For being jealous of his own Brethren, as men of more vertue than himself, he caused them all to be slain; and all the kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath been said) had two Wives; Doris of Leontis, and Aristomache a Syracusian, the Sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded unto him: and by Aristomache he had two Sons and two Daughters, of which the elder, called Sophoclyne, he gave in Marriage to his eldest Son, and her half-Brother Dionysius; the younger, called Arata, he bestowed on his Brother Theodorus: after whose death Dion took her to Wife, being his Niece.

This Dion, a just and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that he was wholly given over to sensuality, prevailed to much with Plato, whose Disciple he had been, as he drew him into Sicil, to instruct the young King. And having perswaded the King to entertain him, he wrought so well with him, as

Dionysius

Dionysius began to change condition; to change Tyranny into Monarchy: And to hold the Principality that he had, rather by the love of his People, and his National Laws, than by the violence of his Guards and Garifons. But this goodness of his lasted not long. For Philitus the Historian, and other his Parafites, that hated Dion severely, wrought him out of the Tyrans favour, and caused him soon after to be banished out of Sicil, to the great grief of the whole Nation. For Dion, as Dionysius made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels between him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great fear; or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with Fifty Gallies at his own charge, during the War against them. His enemies found means, by sinister interpretation, to convert his good will into matter of Treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations, given of Plato, had tended to none other end; than to soften his mind, and to make him neglect his own affairs, by the study of Philosophy; whilst Dion in the mean time having furnished Fifty Gallies under colour of the Kings service, had it in his own power either to deliver to the Syracusians their former liberty, or to make himself Lord and Sovereign of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberal offer which he made, to serve the King with so great a preparation, at his own charge, begot him many Enemies. For they that had served the King for none other end than to raise and enrich themselves, and had already been raised and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer that Dion had made. If the King had had the grace to conceive it aright. But the covetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither knowledge, nor the daring that Dion had, were bold to fill him with Love and Liberality, Pride and Presumptions; and hearkned the young King in his oppressing, and eating up his own People, of whose spoils they themselves shared no small portion. I have heard it. That when Charles the Fifth had the repulse at Algier, in Africa, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the bravest men that ever Spain brought forth, offered unto the Emperor, to continue the Siege at his own charge. But he had never good day after it. For they that envied his Victories, and his Conquest of Mexico in the West-Indies, perswaded the Emperor, that Cortese sought to value himself above him; and to have it said, that what the Emperor could not, Cortese had effected, and therefore was more worthy of the Empire, than he that had it.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented at first to send him the Revenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moveables at his own pleasure: Not without giving hope to recal him in short time. Had he continued in this good mood, like enough it is, that Dion would have been well pleased to live well, as he did, at Athens. But after some time, Dionysius made Port-fale of this Noble-mans goods, and thereby urged him to take another courtie, even to seek the restitution of his Country to liberty. The vertues of Dion, especially his great Liberality, had purchased much Love in Greece. This Love made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant: But it stood him in good stead, when he sought to raise men, with whose help he might return into Sicil. Yet he got not above Eight Hundred (for he carried the matter closely) to follow him in his adventure. But many of them were men of quality, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needful, that would readily assist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicil, marched to Syracuse, entered the City without resistance, Armed the Multitude, and won all, save the Citadel.

Dionysius was then absent in Italy, but he quickly had advertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore he returned hastily to Syracuse: Whence, after many vain Treaties of Peace, and some forcible attempts to recover the Town, he was faine to depart; leaving yet a Cattle to the Custody of Apollocrates his eldest Son. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philitus, coming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recovery of his Countiees liberty, had the fame reward that all worthy men have had from popular Estates. He was disgraced, assaulted and forced to abandon the City. He retired himself to the Leontines, who received him with great joy. Soon after his departure from Syracuse, new Troops enter the Cattle: They fall out, assail, spoil, and burn a great part of the City. Dion is sent for, with humble request: Yet, ere he could arrive, Dionysius his Soldiers were retired; and the Towns-men thinking themselves secure, shut the Gates against Dion. But the next Night they of the Cattle fall out again, with greater fury than ever; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and set fire in all parts of the Town. In this their extremity Dion comes the second time to their succour; the love of his Country surmounting all the injuries that he had received. He sets upon the Garrison of the Cattle, with the one part of his Army; and quencheth the fire every where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after he had Conquered both the Fire and the Sword, that had well nigh burnt to ashes, and depopulated Syracuse, he recovered the Cattle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Apollocrates after Dionysius his Father into Italy. But their malice, of whom he had best deserved, and whom he had loved most, gave an untimely end to his days. For he was soon after his Victory, murdered by Gylippus, who after he had with ill success, awhile governed Syracuse, was slain with the same Dagger, with which he had murdered Dion.

Ten Years after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italy, recovers his Estate; and returns to Syracuse, driving Nysus thence, whom he found Governour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing more than ever, his cruelty, flee to Leontes, a Syracusian born, and then ruling the Leontines. Leontes enters into confederacy with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not only to prevail against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their City. The Syracusians, being desperately assisted on all sides, tend the Carthians for their Country. Leontes also sends thither, and dissuades the Carthians, as well as he can, from intermeddling in the business. He tells them, by his Messengers, That he had entered into a League with the Carthaginians, who were to throng by Sea, that it was not in the power of Carth, to land an Army in Sicil. But the Carthians, being by this Treason of Leontes, more enraged than dissuaded, sent Timoleon with Nineteen Gallies, to deliver Syracuse from Tyranny. In the mean while, Leontes had entered Syracuse, and with the help of the Carthaginians, driven Dionysius into the Cattle, where he besieged him.

Ietes, being himself a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than how to deliver his Country. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to persuade him, to return his Fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium, whose Captains advised Timoleon to get him gone in peace. They had far more Gallies there than he had, and were like to compel him, if he would not be persuaded. Timoleon, finding himself over-mattered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captains, and they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the People, to deliver unto him those arguments for his return, which they had used to him in private: that he might, by public testimony, discharge himself to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, persuading themselves, that a Victory obtained by a few fair words, was without loss, and far more easy, than that of many blows, and wounds, yielded to Timoleon's desire. But while the Orations were delivering, Timoleon, favoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the press; and having let Sail, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Taurrominium, where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governor. From thence he marched toward Adranum, where surprising Ietes his Army, he slew a part thereof, and put the rest to run. It is the Nature of Victory to beget friends. The Adranians joined with him, and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Cattle of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yield up himself, and the places which he could not defend, unto the Corinthians; than either to Ietes, whom he defied, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who, within Fifty Days after his arrival, had recovered the Cattle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to live there a private man, was still invaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices of Ietes. For he Besieged the Corinthians within the Cattle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vain) the Murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send unto Timoleon a supply of Two Thousand Foot, and Two Hundred Horse, which are stayed in Italy by foul weather. Ietes is strengthened with Threecore Thousand Africans, brought unto him by Mago (all which he ledgeth within Syracuse) and with an Hundred and Fifty Gallies, to keep the Port. This was the first time that ever the Carthaginians had Dominion within the Walls of that City. With this great Army Ietes assailed the Cattle: Timoleon sends them Victuals, and succour, in small Boats, by Night, from Catana. Mago and Ietes do therefore resolve to Besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards it, with part of their Forces, than Leon, Captain of the Corinthians, sallied out of the Cattle, and took that part of Syracuse called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the mean while, the Two Thousand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two Thousand other Soldiers, Timoleon marched toward Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Ietes, being frightened out of Sicil (which he might easily have conquered) with an idle rumour of Treason. This made him return to Carthage; where the general exclamation against his cowardise, did to much affright him, that for fear of further punishment he hanged himself. Timoleon enters the City, and bears down the Cattle (which he called The Neph of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the City, when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their Houses did feed on the Grass growing in the Market-place. Therefore he writes to Corinth for People to reinhabit it. Ten Thousand are sent out of Greece, many come from Italy; others from other parts of the Island.

But a new storm ariseth. Afraban and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilubum, with Threecore and Ten Thousand Soldiers, transported (with all their provisions) in a Thousand Ships of burden, and Two Hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Army upon the passage of a River.

A Tempest of Rain, Hail, and Lightning, with boisterous Winds, beating upon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are utterly broken. Ten Thousand slain, Five Thousand taken, with all their Carriages and Provisions: Among which there were found a Thousand Croflets Guile and Graven. After this, Timoleon gave an overthrow to Ietes, and following his Victory, took him, with his Son Eupolemus, and the General of his Horse, Prisoners, whom he caused all to be slain: And afterwards (which was impured to him for great cruelty) he suffered Ietes his Wives and Daughters to be put to death. But this was the revenge of God upon Ietes, who (after the Murder of Dion) had caused Ietes, Dion's Wife, and a young Child of his, with Asistomache his Sister, to be cast into the Sea.

He again prevailed against Mamercus Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana it self. Mamercus fled to Hippion Tyrant of Messina: But Timoleon, pursued him, won the Town; delivering Hippion to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Mamercus, and all other the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made Peace with the Carthaginians, on condition that they should not pass the River of Lycus. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syracusians, till his death, and was solemnly buried by the Citizens in the Market-place of their City: The Day of his Funerals being for ever ordained to be kept holy among them.

After such time as Timoleon had delivered Syracuse from the Tyranny of Dionysius, and brought Peace to the whole Island; the Inhabitants enjoyed their liberty in Peace, about Twenty years. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Marchant Sailed in safety; and the Labouring man enjoyed the fruits of the Earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to govern, nor how to obey, which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings, to govern them; should any long time subsist.

Twenty Years after the death of Timoleon, there flattered up one Agathocles among them, a man of base Birth, and of base condition: Who from a Begger, to a Captain; and so from degree to degree, rising to be a Prator: Finally, became Lord and Sovereign of the Syracusians. Many fortunes he ran, and under-went as many dangers, ere he obtained the Principality. For he had more than once attempted it, attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banished. A passing valiant man he was, and did no base service, as well for those by whom he was employed, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in those Wars against those of Enna, and the Campanians, he did them memorable service; and on the contrary, as memorable service for the Murgantians against the Syracusians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made General of their Forces, he sackt Leontium; and besieged Syracuse so straightly, that the Citizens were driven to crave aid, even from their ancient and natural enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians to relieve Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that he got him to make peace between himself and the Syracusians, binding himself by Promise and Oath to remain a Friend and Servant to the State of Carthage, for ever after. Amilcar entertained the business, and compounded the quarrels between Agathocles and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prator; he entertains five Thousand Africans, and diverse old Soldiers of the Murgantians, under colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poor and discontented Syracusians (the City also being divided into many factions) he assails the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposites; divides the Spoil of the rich among the poor; and gives liberty to his Soldiery, to Rob, to Ravish, and to Murder, for two whole days and nights, without controulment: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and strewed the streets with ten Thousand dead Carcasses, besides those that had broken their necks over the walls; their fury had no further subject to work on.

Agathocles, in an assembly of the people (being an eloquent Knave) persuaded them, that, for the violent sickness, by which the Common-wealth was utterly consumed, he found no better than the violent remedies which he had administered: and that he affected no other thing than the reducing of the State from an Oligarchy, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democracy, by which it had been governed, from the first institution, with so great glory and prosperity. This he did, to have the Crown clasp on his head (as it were) perforce. For, as he knew that he had left none living, within the City, fit or able to exercise the office of a Magistrate; so he knew he might well, that all they which had assisted in the murder and spoil of their fellow-Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawless Lord, who had been partaker with them in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this able, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King; again and again saluting and adoring him, by that name, as if it had been given to him by some lawful election: Hence had our King Richard the third a piece of his pattern; but the one was of base, the other of Kingly Parents: the one took liberty from a Common-wealth, the other fought only to succeed in a Monarchy; the one continued his cruelty to the end, the other, after he had obtained the Crown, fought, by making good Laws, to recover the love of his people.

The life of this Tyrant is briefly written by Justinus; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the sum whereof is this. The same Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him five Thousand men to help in the Massacre of the Citizens, was also content to wink at many wrongs that he did unto the confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilcar, to settle Agathocles in his tyranny, and to let him vex and waste the whole Island; because it was thereby like to come to pass, that he should reduce all Sicil into such terms as would make it become an easy prey to Carthage. But when the Cities, confederate with the Carthaginians, sent their Embassadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Panick faith (so much taunted by the Romans, as no better then mere falldoom) threw itself very honourable in taking order for the redress. Embassadors were sent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in mind of his Covenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africa, and a new Captain appointed to succeed in his charge, with such forces, as might compel Agathocles to reason, if otherwise he would not hearken to it. All this tended to save the Confederates, from suffering such injuries in the future. For that which was past (since it could not be recalled) they took order to have it severely punished. Amilcar was accused secretly, and by way of scrutiny; the suffrages being given, but not calculated; and so referred until he should return. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilcar had soon notice of it. In managing his business with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his own profit, as well as to the public benefit of his Country. For he had made such a compulsion with the Syracusians, as gave them not only means to weaken others, but to strengthen himself, both in Power and Authority, even against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the custom of those, that hope to work their own ends by cunning practices, thinking to deal subtly and finely, they spin their threads so small, that they are broken with the very wind. Amilcar saw, that the Carthaginians had a purpose to deal substantially; and that therefore it would be hard for him, to make them follow his crooked devices; which if he could not do, it was to be expected, that their anger would break out into so much the greater extremity, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which some of his fore-goes had taught him; and, for fear of such a death as the Judges might award him, he ended his own life in what sort he thought best. This desperation of Amilcar served to inform Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. He saw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore resolved to get the start of them in action. He dissembled no longer; but, instead of Spoil and Robbery, made open War upon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicil his own, ere the Carthaginian Forces arrived: which thinking to have incouraged an ill-established Tyrant, found him ready, as a King, to defend his own, and give them sharp entertainment. They were beaten by him; and their Navy was so completely-beaten, that they could neither do good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leave their business undone, and return into Africa.

The Carthaginians prepare a new Fleet; which being very gallantly manned and furnished, was broken, by foul weather, and the best part of it cast away, even whilst it was yet within kenning of their City. But Amilcar, the Son of Gilco, gathering together the remainders of his Ship-wreck, was bold to pass over into Sicil, and landed not far from Gela; where Agathocles was soon ready to examine the cause of their coming. Many skirmishes passed between them, in which (commonly) the Syracusians had the better. But his good success begat presumption; whereby he lost a Battle more important important than all the other fights. One adverse chance is enough to overthrow the State of a Tyrant, if it be not upheld by great circumspection. The War was soon transferred to the walls of Syracuse; within which Agathocles was closed up, and driven to make his last defence by their help, who may be judged to have loved him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuse, after that great Massacre of the principal men, made in the beginning of this new Tyranny (were for the most part) such, as had been either mercenary Soldiers, enfranchised slaves, or base and needy people; helpers in establishing the present government, and Executioners of the Murders, and Spoil committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were few well observed, and (withal) so fearful, that they durst not stir. But it was enough that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their City, Famine was likely to grow upon them, and inforce them to change their resolution. In this necessity Agathocles adventured upon a strange course, which the event commended as wise. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in those Vessels that rode in the Haven; and committing the Government of the City to his Brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) he had be thought himself of a mean, both to raise the fleet, and to repair all other losses. A Carthaginian Fleet lay in the mouth of the Haven, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keep the besieged from issuing forth.

Now, at such time as Agathocles was ready to depart, advertisement came, that many Ships of burden, laden with Corn, and other provisions, were drawing near unto Syracuse. To intercept these the Carthaginians hoist sail, and lanch forth into the deep. They were not far gone, when they might behold Agathocles issuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to give convoy unto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheel about, and make main toward him, as thinking him the better booty. He neither abode their coming, nor fled back into the City, but made all speed towards Africk; and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as the day would give them light. In the mean season the Victuallers were gotten to Syracuse, which was the more plentifully relieved by their coming, for that Agathocles had unburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admiral perceived, first, that by pursuing two fleets at once, he had mislead of them both: And secondly, that Agathocles returned not again, but was gone to seek his fortune elsewhere, he thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend so well upon them, that they should not have leisure to mischiefe in some other part.

The Carthaginian Navy followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of such as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and overtook him after six days. He had (at the first) a great start of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themselves in seeking their own misfortune: For he fought with them, and beat them; and, having sunk or taken many, drove the rest to flye which way they could, laden with such strange tydings of his Voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discover unto them his project, letting them understand, that there was no better way to divert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse, but from all the life of Sicily, than by bringing the War to their own doors. For here (said he) they have many that hate them, and that will readily take Arms against them, as soon as they perceive that there is an Army on foot, which dares to look upon their Walls. Their Towns are ill-fortified; their people untrained, and experienced in dangers; the mercenary forces that they levy in those parts, will rather follow us than them, if we offer greater wages than they can give: which we may better promise and make good, by letting them have some share with us in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can do, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many brave words encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their Ships (reserving one or two to use as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remain, save only in victory. In this heat of resolution, they win by force two Cities; which after they had thoroughly sacked, they burne to the ground: as a mark of terrour to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Army destroyed in Sicily. This impression so dismayes them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had scaped in the late Sea-fight; yet still they fear, and know not what. They suspect Amilcar's faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspected their principal Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage unto the enemy; they raise a great Army, and know not to whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captains in the City, Hanno and Bomilcar, great enemies, and therefore the more unlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generals of the Army levied, which far exceed the forces of Agathocles. But it seldom happens, that dissention between Commanders produceth any fortunate event. Necessity drove Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deal with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made ease the victory against the one half of them. For Bomilcar would not stir, but suffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this great victory, brought over a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian society, to take part with Agathocles: who pursued his victory, winneth many Towns, and sends word to Syracuse of his good success. The Carthaginians also send unto Sicily, willing Amilcar, their General, to succour the State of Africk, which was in danger to be lost, whilst he was travelling in the Conquest of Sicily. Amilcar sends them five Thousand men: All his forces he thought it not needful to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles back into Sicily, than to be drawn home by one, that could scarce resist his own Kingdom. But these good hopes had a bad issue. He spent some time in winning a few Towns that adhered unto the Syracussians: And having brought his matters to some good order, he conceived a certain hope of taking Syracuse by surprize. It was a pretty (though tragical) Accident, if it were true, as Thuly relates it. Amilcar had a dream which told him that he should sup the next day within Syracuse. His fancy begot this dream, and he verily believed it. He made more haste than good speed toward the City: And coming upon it on the sudden, had good hope to carry it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laid an ambush to entrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried prisoner into the City; in which it was likely that he had no great cheer to his supper: For they struck off his head, and sent it unto Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good success of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Army, that Agathocles was bold to wear a Crown, and stile himself King of Africk. He had allured Opellus, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promising to deliver the Country into his hands: For that (as is said) it was sufficient unto himself to have diverted the Carthaginians from Sicily, wherein (after this War ended) he might Reign quietly. Opellus came with a great Army, and was friendly entertained. But the traitorous Sicilian, taking an advantage, did murder this his assistant; and afterwards by good words, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenean Army to follow him in his Wars. Thus his villany found good success; and he so prevailed in Africk, that he got leisure to make a step into Sicily. Many Towns in Sicily had embraced a desire of recovering their liberty; thinking it high time to fight at length for their own freedom, and that they had for long been exposed (as a reward of victory) either unto Aliens, or to Tyrants of their own Country. These had prevailed far, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the coming of Agathocles abated their high Spirits; and his good success in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of Sicily he returned into Africk, where his affairs stood in very bad terms. Archagathus, his Son had lost a Batel; and (which was worse) had ill means to help himself: His Army being in mutiny for lack of pay. But Agathocles pacified the Tumult, by the accustomed presents of great booty and spoil. It had now been time for him to offer peace to the Carthaginians: in which to obtain, they would (questionless) have given to him both money enough to pay his Army, and all that they then held in Sicily. For their City had been distressed, not only by this his War, but by the Treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himself Tyrant over them. But ambition is blind. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed upon the conquest of Carthage: it self: Out of which dream he was awakened, by the loss of a Batel, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange events following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this War, had renewed their sacrifices of Children to Saturnus: From which they had obtained ever since they made peace with Gelus. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners taken in the Batel, to offer unto the fad Idol; in way of thankfulness to their victory. The fire, with which these unhappy men were consumed, caught hold upon the lodgings nearest unto the Altar, and spreading it self farther through the Camp, with the destruction of many men, caused such a Tumult as is usual in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt up the Pavillion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away, each of them believing, that the noise in the adverse Camp, was a sign of the enemies coming to invade it. But the Carthaginians had a safe retreat: Agathocles, by a second error, fell into a new calamity. In the beginning of this his flight in the dark, he met with his own African Soldiers; and thinking them to be enemies (as indeed the one half of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last Batel) he began to assail them, and was so stoutly resisted, that he lost in this blind fight above four Thousand of his men. This did discourage his proud heart, that, being fallen from the near hope of taking the City of Carthage, unto some distrust of his own safety, he knew no more how to moderate his present weak fears, than lately he had known how to govern his ambition. Therefore he took the way that came next in to his hand; which was to steal closely aboard his Ships, with his younger Son (the elder he suspected of treachery, and of Ambition) and so to flye into Sicily, thinking it the best course to shift for himself, as wanting Vessels wherewith to transport his Army. His elder Son Archagathus, perceiving his drift, arrested him, and put him under custody: But by means of a sudden Tumult, he was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leaving both his Sons behind him. His flight being noyed through the Army, all was in an uproar; and extremity of Rage caused not only the common Soldier, but even such as had been friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold upon his two Sons, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extremely base, I need not of words to prove: That his fear was truly, as all fear is said to be, a palli, depriving him of the succours which reason offered, the foolish doth manifest. His forsaken Soldiers, being now a headless company, and no longer an Army to be feared, obtained nevertheless a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: To whom they told those places, whereof they had possession, for nineteen Talents. Likewise Agathocles himself, having lost his Army, did nevertheless, by the reputation of this late War, make peace with Carthage upon equal terms.

After this, the Tyrant being delivered from foreign enemies, discovered his bloody nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants and his fears, urged him to do violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoils of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: But in a heathly rage depopulated whole Cities. He devised new Engines of Torment; wherein striving to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of Brass, that should serve to scorch mens Bodies, and wihal give him leave to behold them in their misery. So devilish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slave to his brutish affections. In these mischiefs he was so outrageous, that he neither spared Sex, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the laughter of his Children in Africk. But this was not the way to preserve his estate: It drew him into new dangers. They whom he had chased out of his Country took arms against him, and drove him into such fears; that he was fain to seek that love at Carthage, which by ruling well he might have had in Sicily. He freely delivered into the Carthaginian hands, all those Towns of the Phoenicians in Sicily, belonging unto them, which were in his possession. They required him honourably, with great store of Corn, and with four Hundred Talents of Gold and Silver. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he prevailed against the Rebels, and ceased his estate. Having no further business left in Sicily, he made a voyage unto Italy. There he subdued the Bruttians, rather by revour of his name than by any force, for they yielded at his first coming. This done, he went to the life of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one Hundred Talents of Gold. But when he had gotten this great summe, he would needs exact a greater; and hiding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoil the Temples of their Gods. Herein (we think) he did well enough. For how could he believe those to be Gods, that had

continually given deaf ears to his horrible perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with Eleven Ships laden with Gold: All which, and all the rest of the Fleet, were cut away by foul weather at Sea; one Gally excepted, in which he himself escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grievous sickness fell upon him, that rotted his whole Body, spreading it fell through all his veins and sinews. Whilst he lay in this case, all desiring his end, save only Theogina (a Wife that he had taken out of Egypt) and her small Children: His Nephew, the Son of Agathobolus, before mentioned, and a younger Son of his own, began to contend about the Kingdom. Neither did they seek to end the controversy by the old Tyrant's decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laid wait for the others life: Wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he slew his Uncle, and got his Grandfather's Kingdom, without asking any leave. These tydings wounded the heart of Agathobolus with fear and sorrow. He saw himself without help, like to become a prey to his ungracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no favour was to be expected, either himself, or by those, whom only he now held dear, which were Theogina and her Children. Therefore he advised her and them to fly before they were surprised: For that otherwise they could by no means avoid either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gave them all his Treasures and Goods, where-with he even compelled them (weeping to leave him desolate in so wretched a case) to embark themselves hastily, and make speed into Egypt. After their departure, whether he threw himself into the Fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him, but he ended his life as basely, as obscure, and in as much want as he first began it.

After the death of Agathobolus it was, that the Mamertines, his Soldiers, traitorously occupied Messana, and infested a great part of the Island. Then also did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of Conquering all Sicily. What the Nephew of Agathobolus did, I cannot find. Likely it is that he quickly perished. For the Sicilians were driven to fend for Pyrhus to help them, who had Married with a Daughter of Agathobolus. But Pyrhus was soon weary of the Country (as hath been shewed before) and therefore left it: Proving that it would become a goodly champion Field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superiority. In which business, how their two great Cities did speed, the order of our story will declare.

SECT. V.

A recontination of the Roman War in Sicily. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsook the Carthaginians, and made his peace with Rome.

When Appius Claudius, following the advantage of his Victory gotten at Messana, brought the War unto the Gates of Syracuse, and Besieged that great City, Hieron found it high time for him to seek peace: Knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himself by what means he could, when they were not in case to give him assistance; and foreseeing what, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without fear of molestation, whilst Rome and Carthage were fighting for the mastery. In this good mood the new Roman Consuls, M. Fulvius, and C. Otacilius found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made use of their present advantage, and sold him peace for a Hundred (some say two Hundred) Talents.

These Consuls had brought a great Army into Sicily; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring over Hiero to their side. If the Syracusans held them busied (which I find not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the sum of Money imposed upon him, and by their performing none other piece of service) all the whole time of their abode in the Island; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no less to his honour than it was to his commodity. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his own Kingdom to run into manifest peril of subversion, for their sakes that should have received all the profit of the Victory: Seeing they did expose him to the whole danger without straining themselves to give him relief. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proof of the strength of Syracuse, in the days of Agathobolus: And therefore knew, that it was able to bear a very strong Siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slack, in sending help: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their own work might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the Besieged City was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had been when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason to try the uttermost hazard of War against the Carthaginians, who fought no other thing than to bring it into slavery: Not to against the Romans, who though it sufficient if they could withdraw it from the party of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathobolus, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the Citizens endured, so long as he might preserve his own Tyranny: The latter, as a just and good Prince, had no greater desire than to win the love of his People by seeking their commodity; but including his own felicity within the publick, laboured to uphold both, by honest and faithful dealing. Hereby it came to pass that he enjoyed a long and happy Reign, living dear to his own Subjects, beloved of the Carthaginians, whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himself, ere he left their Society, made unwilling to seek his ruin; or their more earnest business with the Romans, made unable to compass it.

SECT. VI.

How the Romans Besiege and win Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintain a Fleet. Their first loss, and first victory by Sea. Of Sea-fight in general.

Hieron, having sided himself with the Romans, aided them with Victuals and other necessities;

faries: So that they, presuming upon his assistance, recal some part of their forces. The Carthaginians find it high time to bestir them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the Troops they had in Spain, to come to their aid; who being arrived, they made the City of Agri-gen-tum the Seat of the War, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Consuls, having made Peace with Hieron, return into Italy, and, in their places, Lucius Posthumus and Quintus Mamilius arrive. They go on towards Agri-gen-tum: And finding no enemy in the Field, they Besiege it, though it were studded with Fifty Thousand Soldiers. After a while, the time of Harvest being come, a part of the Roman Army range the Country to gather Corn, and those at the Siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians fall furiously, and, in danger the Roman Army, but are in the end repelled into the Town with great loss; but by the smart loss on both sides, the Assaults redoubled their Guards, and the Besieged kept within their Cover. Yet the Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deep Trench between the Walls of the City and their Camp: And another on the outside thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force them suddenly, by a Sally; nor those of the Country without, break upon them unawares: Which double Defence kept the Besieged also from the receiving any relief of Victuals, and munitions, whilst the Syracusans supplies the assaults with what they want. The Besieged find for succor to Carthage, after they had been in this fort pent up Five Months. The Carthaginians imbarc an Army, with certain Elephants, under the command of Hanno; who arrives with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agri-gen-tum. Hanno put himself into the Field, and surpriseth Erbesius, a City wherein the Romans had bestowed all their Provision. By means hereof, the Famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agri-gen-tum; and the Roman Camp no less straightly assailed by Hanno, than the City was by the Romans: Inasmuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had been forced to abandon the Siege. But seeing that this distress was not enough to make them flee, Hanno determined to give them Battle. To which end, departing from Heraclea, he makes approach unto the Roman Camp. The Romans resolve to fight with him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directs the Numidian Horsemen to charge the Van-guard, as if to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to return as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay shadowed behind some rising ground. The Numidians perform it accordingly; and while the Romans pursued the Numidians, Hanno gives upon them, and having slaughtered many, beats the rest into their Trenches.

But their greatest pomp and magnificence, was in their goodly Temples, and Theatres, Water-Conduits, and Fifth-Ponds: The ruins whereof at this day are sufficient arguments, that Rome fell could never boast of the like. In the Porch of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, (by which we may judge of the Temple itself) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods, all cut out in polished Marble of divers colours; a work the most magnificent and rare that ever hath been seen: On the other side, the War of Troy, and the encounters which hapned at that Siege; with the Personages of the Heroes that were done in that War; all of the like beautiful Stone, and of equal Statute to the Bodies of those men in Ancient times: In comparison of which, the latter works of that kind, are but petty things, and meet to be despised. It would require a Volume to express the magnificence of the Temples of Heracles, Apolonius, Cerberus, Juno, Lutina, Chastity, Proserpina, Castor and Pollux, wherein the Master-Pieces of those exquisite Painters and Carvers Phidias, Zuchius, Myron, and Polignotus, were to be seen. But in process of time it ran the same fortune, that all other great Cities have done, and was ruined by divers calamities of War: Whereof this War proved brought unto it the least.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two Months, but lay strongly encamped, waiting until some opportunity should invite them. But Annibal that was Besieged in Agri-gen-tum, as well by Signs as Messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremity which he endured, was able to brook such dilatory courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, provoked the Consuls to fight: But his Elephants being disordered by his own Vanguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day: And with such as escaped, he recovered Heraclea. Annibal perceiving this, and remaining hopeless of succour, resolved to make his own way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this day's Victory, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the Night; he rusk out of the Town, with all the remainder of his Army, and past by the Roman Camp without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the Morning, but in vain: Sure they were, that he could not carry the City with him, which with little ado the Romans entered, and pitifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this Victory, pursued rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this War, only to succour the Mamertines, and to keep the Carthaginians from their own Coasts: But now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sicily and from thence, being favoured with the Wind of good success, to Sail over into Africa. It is the desire of Kings, of States, and also of private men, to cover the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the desire of that which we neither have nor need, taking from us the true use and fruition of what we have already. This curse upon mortal men, was never taken from them since the beginning of the World unto this day.

To prosecute this War, Lucius Valerius and Titus Otacilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicily. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the Field, many in-lain Towns gave themselves unto them. On the contrary, the Carthaginians, keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, and many Maritime places became theirs. The Romans therefore as well to secure their own Coasts, often invaded by the African Fleets, as to equal themselves in every kind of Warfare with their Enemies, determine to make a Fleet. And herein fortune favoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in Ship-wrights Craft, a storm of Wind thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of Five Banks, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a Pattern, and by it they began to set up an Hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by Five on every Bank; and Twenty, of three on a Bank: And while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of Rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed upon the Sea Sands many Sars, in order of the Banks in Gallies, whereon they placed their Water-men, and taught them to beat the Sand with long Poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learn the stroke of the Gally, and how to mount and draw their Oars.

far behind them. For so it must needs fall out; seeing that the Third Squadron towed their Horse-Boats and Victuallers; and the Fourth had the Rearward of all. According to Amilcar's direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken the thin Front of the Carthaginian first Fleet, which ran away, they forthwith gave after them with all speed possible, not so much as looking behind them for the Second Squadron. Hereby the Romans were drawn near unto the body of the Carthaginian Fleet, led by Amilcar, and by him (as the first) received a great loss, until their Second Squadron came up, which forced Amilcar to break him to his Oars. Hanno also who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian Fleet, invaded the Roman Rearward, and prevailed against them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcellus Attilius fell back to their succour, and put the Carthaginians to their heels; as not able to sustain both Squadrons. The Rear being relieved, the Consuls came to the aid of their Third Battalion, which towed their Victuallers, which were also in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: But the Consuls, joining their Squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part also to running.

This Victory fell unto the Romans, partly by the hardness of their Soldiers; but principally, for that Amilcar, being first beaten, could never after joy himself unto any of his other Squadrons, that remained, as yet in a like likelihood of prevailing, so long as they fought upon equal terms, and but Squadron to Squadron. But Amilcar forsaking the fight, thereby left a full Fourth part of the Roman Fleet unengaged, and ready to give succour to any of the other parts that were oppressed. So as in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day: For they lost but Four and Twenty of theirs; whereas the Africans lost Thirty that were sunk, and Threethree and Thirt that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also divided his Fleet into Four Squadrons, (besides those that he ranged in the Front to draw on the Enemies, and to engage them) and that, whilst he himself fought with one Squadron that charged him, all the rest of the Enemies Fleet had been at the same time entertained, he had prevailed: But the Second Squadron, being free, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amilcar was oppressed: and Amilcar, being oppressed and fettered, the Consuls had good leisure to relieve both the Third and the Fourth Squadron, and gain the Victory.

Charles the fifth, among other the Precepts to Philip the Second his Son, where he advised him concerning War against the Turks, tells him, that in all Battles between them and the Christians, he should never fail to charge the Tunisians in the beginning of the fight, and to engage them at once with the rest. For (saith he) the Tunisians, who are always reserved intire in the Rear of the Battle, and in whom the Turk reposest his greatest confidence; come up, in a grofs body, when all the Troops on both sides are disbanded and in confusion; whereby they carry the Victory before them without resistance. For the Romans also prevail against other Nations. For they kept their Triarii in store (who were the choice of their Army) for the up-shot and last blow. A great and Victorious advantage it hath ever been found, to keep some one or two good Troops to look on, when all else are disbanded and engaged.

SECT VIII.

The Romans prevail in Affrick. Attilius the Consul, propoundeth intolerable conditions of Peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten and made Prisoner.

NOW the Romans, according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-Victualled their Fleet, set Sail for Africa, and arrived at the Promontory of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some Forty Leagues from Utica in Sicily, where Amilcar himself as yet laid. From this Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontory, till they came to Clypea, a Town about Fifty English Miles from it. There they disembarked and prepared to Besiege Clypea, which to ease them of labour, was yielded unto them. Now had they a Port of their own on Affrick side; without which all invasions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their own Carthage, fearing that the Roman Fleet and Army had directed themselves thither: But being advertised that they had taken Clypea, they made Provisions of all sorts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans went to Rome for directions, and in the mean while waitd round about them. The Order given for the Senate, was, That one of the Consuls should remain with the Army, and that the other should return with the Fleet into Italy. According to this direction, Marcellus the Consul is sent home to Rome; whither he carried with him Twenty Thousand African Captains, with all the Roman Fleet and Army; except forty Ships, fifteen Thousand Foot, and five Hundred Horse, that were left with Attilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily won some Towns and places that were unwarred, and laid Siege to others. But he performed no great matter before he came to Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that near unto the River of Brigada, he encountered with a Serpent of One Hundred and Twenty foot long, which he flew, not without loss of many Soldiers, being driven to use against it such Engines of War, as served properly for the assaulting of Towns. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Army, whereof the Captains were Hanno and Bossar, together with Amilcar, who had brought over out of Sicily Five Thousand Foot, and Five Hundred Horse to succour his Country. These (belike) had an intent, rather to weary him out of Affrick, by wary preparation of time, than to undergo the hazard of a main fight. They were careful to hold themselves free from necessity of coming to blows: yet had they a great desire to save the Town of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their general purpose, and yet to disturb him in the Siege of Adis, they incamp near unto him, and strongly (as they think) on the top of an Hill: But thereby they lose the services both of their Elephants, and of their Horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs, Regulus discovers, and makes use of it. He assaults them in their strength, which they defend a while and was one of the three Keys, which he gave in charge to Philip the second his Son to keep safe to win, this Tunis, the Key of Affrica; Fishing, the Key of the Netherlands; and Adis, the Key of Spain. But two of these Philip lost, but he never found them again; the third our Charles was bold, in the time of the renowned Queen Elizabeth, to wing out of his hand: where we stayed not to pick any lock, but brake open the doors, and having rifled all, threw it into the fire.

By the loss of this Battail at Adis, and more especially by the loss of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismayed. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the West, insult upon their misfortunes, invade, and spoil their Territory, and force those that inhabit abroad, to forsake their Villages and Fields, and to hide themselves within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great Famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Attilius finds his own advantage, and assures himself that the City could not long hold out: Yet he feared lest it might defend it self, until his time of Office, that was near expired, should be quite run out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reap the honour of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it self, perfwades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded unto them the worthy and safe conditions, as whereby their hearts, formerly possessed with fear, became now to courageous and disdainful, that they resolved, either to defend their liberty, or dye to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great troop of Greeks, whom they had formerly sent to entertain. Among these was a very expert Soldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, and of the overthrow which the Carthaginians received near unto Adis, gave it out publickly; that the fame was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit, ran till it came to the Senate; Xantippus in brief, gave the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made General of the African Forces, he puts himself into the field. The Army which he led, consisted of no more than twelve Thousand Foot, and four Thousand Horse, with an Hundred Elephants. No greater were the Forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Liberties, Lives, Goods, Wives, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were misnumbered: the one consisting of an Hundred and forty Thousand, and the other of an Hundred and fifty which use the service of mercenary Soldiers, are stronger abroad, than their own doors.

Xantippus, taking the Field with his Army, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his Troops upon fair and level ground, fitted both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them Battel. The Romans wondered much, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: But confident they were, that it should soon be abated. Their chief care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Felices, or light-armed Soldiers, as a forlorn hope; that they might either with darts and other calling-weapons, drive back the Beasts upon the enemies, or at least break their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely upon the Legions. To the same end, they made their Battails deeper in file, than they had been accustomed to do. By which means, as they were the less subject unto the impression of the Elephants; so were they to much the more exposed unto the violence of the Horse, wherein the enemy did far exceed them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one rank, before his Army; which followed him at a reasonable distance: His Horsemen, and some light-armed Foot, of the Carthaginian Auxiliaries were in the wings. The first onset was given by the Elephants, against which the Felices were so unable to make resistance, that they brake into the Battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman Battail was helpful. For when the Beasts had spent their Force, in peircing through a few of the thir Ranks; the Squadrons nevertheless persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian Horse, having at the first encounter, by reason of their advantage in number, driven those of Adis out of the Field, began to charge the Roman Battalions in flank, and put them in great distress; who being forced to turn face every way, could neither pass forward nor yet retire; but had very much ado to make good the ground where they stood. In the mean while, such of the Romans, as had escaped the fury of the Elephants, and left them at their backs, fell upon the Carthaginian Army, that met them in very good array. It was no even match. The one were a disordered Company, wearied with labour and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to have dealt with the enemy upon equal terms. Here was therefore a great slaughter with little fight; the Romans hastily recoiled to the body of their Army, which being furrounded with the enemy, and spent with travail, fell all to rout, upon the defeat of these Troops, that open the way to a general overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full Victory; destroying the whole Roman Army, save two Thousand, and taking five Hundred Prisoners, together with Attilius the Consul. Of their own they lost no more than eight Hundred Mercenaries, which were slain when the fight began, by two Thousand of the Romans: That wheeling about to avoid the Elephants, bare down all before them: And made way even to the Carthaginian Trenches. These were the two Thousand that escaped, when the whole Army behind them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slain. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no less her Vassals, than were the Carthaginians: How insolent soever they had been in their propitiation of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperity, which the never gave nor sold to any mortal man. With what joy these news were welcomed, when they came to Carthage, we may easily conjecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to pass in the World, there are many examples to prove, no less than this of Xantippus: All of them confirming that sentence of Euripides, Mens una sapiens, plurimum vincit manus; Many ment hands equal not one wise mind.

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus, returned into Greece; whether for that he was more envied than honoured, or for what other cause, it is unknown.

The death of Attilius Regulus the Consul, was very memorable. He was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ransom of Prisoners on both sides: Giving his faith to return if the business were not effected. When he came to Rome, and and plainly saw that his Country should lose by the bargain: So far was from urging the Senate upon compassion of his own misery, that he earnestly perswaded to have the Prisoners in Africk, left to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage: where for his pains taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancy and faith, all Writers highly extol him. But the Carthaginians seem to have judged him an obdurate and malicious enemy, that neither in his prosperity would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamity would have the natural care, to preserve himself and others, by yielding to such an office of humanity, as is common in all Wars (not grounded upon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small advantage. Whatsoever the Carthaginians thought of him; sure it is that his faithful observance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that grave speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of Prisoners, appears, in all reason, to have proceeded from a vain-glorious forwardness, rather than from any necessity of State. For the exchange was made soon after his death; wherein the Romans had the worse bargain, by so much as Regulus himself was worth. As for the authority of all Historians, that magnify him in this point; we are to consider, that they lived under the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extremest torments, could not be more grievous to him, than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither do I think that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein; or otherwise than by recrimination: Saying, that the Romans deserved to be no better treated, for as much as it is their ordinary practice to use others in the like sort. Cruelly doth not become more warlike, but rather more odious, by being customary. It was the Roman fashion, to whip almost to death, and then to behead the Captains of their enemies whom they took, yes, although they were such as had always made fair Wars with them. Wherefore it seems not meet, in reason, that they should cry out against the like Tyrannical infolency in others, as if we were lawful only in ourselves.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Attilius his intolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians fear was changed by meer desperation; calls to remembrance, the like infolency of others in prosperity, that hath bred the like infolency in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath been denied. In such cases I never hold it impertinent, to add a motto more, relictionies; approving the true rules, from which our passions carry us away.

In the year 1378. the Genuovians won so fast upon the Venicians, as they not only drove their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their own Fleet within two miles of Venice itself. This bred such an amazement in the City of Venice, that they offered unto the Genuovians (their state reserved) whatsoever they would demand. But Peter Doria blown up with many former Victories, would hearken to no compulsion; save the yielding of their City and State to his discretion. Hereupon the Venicians, all being filled with disdain, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining power, and assailed Doria with such desperate fury, that they break his Fleet, kill Doria himself, take nineteen of his Gallies, four score Boats of Pada; and four Thousand Prisoners, recover Chioggia, and all the places taken from them; and following their Victory, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genuovians safely to beg peace, to their extremest dishonour and disadvantage, being beaten: which, being Victorious, they might have commanded, to their greatest honour and advantage. The like happened to the Earl of Flanders, in the year 1380. when having taken a notable, and whilst an over-cruel revenge upon the Genois, he refused mercy to the rest, who in all humility, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their City, Goods, and Estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had unadvisedly refused, and was resolved to extinguish them utterly; they issue out of their City with five Thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earl, break his Army, enter Bruges (a pell-mell) with his vanquished followers; and enforce him to hide himself under an heap of straw, in a poor Cottage; out of which with great difficulty he escaped, and saved himself. Such are the fruits of Infolency.

SECT. IX.

How the affairs of Carthage prospered after the Victory against Attilius: How the Romans, having lost their Fleet by Tempest, resolve to forsake the Sea: The great advantages of a good Fleet in War, between Nations divided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late Victory, all places that had been lost in Africk, return to the obedience of Carthage. Only Clypea stands out; before which the Carthaginians lie down, and assail it, but in vain: For the Romans, hearing of the loss of Attilius, with their forces in Africk, and whilst Clypea was besieged, make ready a gross Army, and transport it in a Fleet of three Hundred and fifty Gallies, commanded by M. Emilius, and Ser. Fulvius, their Consuls. At the Promontory of Mercator, two Hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out for purpose, upon the bruit of their coming, encounter them: But greatly to their cost. For the Romans took by force an Hundred and fourteen of their Fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they laid no longer, than to take in their own men that had been besieged: And this done they made amain towards Sicily, in hope to recover all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this hasty Voyage they despise the advice of the Pilots, who pray them to find harbour in time, for that the season threatened some violent Storms, which ever impinged between the rising of Orion, and of the * Dog-Star. Now * There is some. We have upon our Coast a Michinus flow that seldom or never fails. In the West Indies in the Mouths of Anguila and Saguer, those most forcible Winds, which the Spaniards call the Nortes, or North-winds, are very fearful: And therefore they that Navigate in those parts, take harbour till these Months be ended. Charles the Fifth being as ill advised, in passing the Sea towards Alger, in the Winter quarter contrary to the Counsel of A. Doria; as he was in the like unseasonable time to continue his siege before Mazila; and his antient and forty Ships by Tempests, and fierce Gallies, with ill effect in them, of men, Victuals, Horries, and munition: a loss no less great, than his retreat, both from before the one and the other, was extremest dishonourable.

to lay within some Port as they were advised, they would needs put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their reputation, after this Victory against the Carthaginian Fleet, to take a few worthless Towns upon the Coast. The merciless winds in the mean while overtake them, and near unto Camerina, overturn and thrust headlong on the Rocks, so that their former great Victory was devoured by the Seas, before the fame thereof recovered Rome.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had happened, repair all their Warlike Vessels, hoping once again to command the Seas: They are also as confident of their Land Forces since the overthrow of Attilius. They send Ashdrubal into Sicily with all their old Soldiers, and an Hundred and forty Elephants embarked in two Hundred Gallies. With this Army and Fleet he arrives at Lilybæum, where he begins to vex the Parthians of Rome. But adversity doth not discourage the Romans: They build in three months (a matter of great note) one Hundred and twenty Ships; with which, and the remainder of their late Ship-wreck, they row to Paeninsula, or Palerna, the chief City of the Africans in Sicily, and surround it by Land and Water: After a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison therein, return to Rome.

Very delicious the Romans were to be doing in Africk: To which purpose they employed C. Scervilius, and C. Sulpicius, their Consuls. But they wrought no wonders. Some spoil they made upon the Coasts of Africk: But Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their return, they were first set upon the Sands, and like to have had perished, near unto the lesser Syrtis, where they were fain to heave all over-board, that so they might get off: Then, having with much ado doubled the Cape of Lilybæum, in their passage from Paeninsula towards Traby, they lost an Hundred and fifty of their Ships by foul weather. A greater discouragement never Nation had, than the god of the Wars favoured them no more, than the god of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Maz enrich them with upon the Land, Neptune robbed them upon the Seas. For they had now lost, besides what they lost in fight, four Hundred and six Ships and Gallies, with all the munition and Soldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby received, persuaded them to give over their Navigation and their fight by Sea, and to send only a Land-Army into Sicily, under L. Cælius, and F. Furius, their Consuls. These they transport in some three score ordinary passage Boats, by the fraights of Messina, land to land. In like sort, the overthrow which Attilius received in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them less cholerick against the Carthaginians, than before; so that for two years after, they kept the high and woody grounds, not daring to fight in the fair and Champaign Countries. But this late resolution of forsaking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for them to succour those places which they held in Sicily, without a Navy, much less to maintain the War in Africa. For, whereas the Romans were to send Forces from Messina to Egesta, to Lilybæum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Sicily, making sometime a march of above an Hundred and forty English mile by land, which could not be performed without an Army, and the provisions that follow it, in less than fourteen days; the Carthaginians would pass it with their Gallies, in eight and forty hours.

An old example we have, of that great advantage of transporting Armies by water, between Cannus, and Edmund Ironside. For Cannus, when he had entred the Thames, with his Navy and Army, and could not prevail against London, suddenly embarked; and sailing to the West, landed in Dorsetshire, so drawing Edmund and his Army thither. There finding ill entertainment, he again ship his men, and entred the Severn, making Edmund to march after him, to the succour of Worcester, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmund there, he failed back again to London: By means whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled, where he pleased, ere succour could arrive. And this was not the last help, which the Netherlands have had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their liberty, that being Masters of the Sea, they could pass their Army from place to place, unvexed, and entire, with all the Munition and Artillery belonging unto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies have been able to do it. O! this an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now living, one of the greatest Captains, and one of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages have brought forth, in the year 1590. carried his Army by Sea, with forty Cannonsto Breda. Making countenance either to besiege Basilard, or Overdrum Berg; which the enemy (in prevention) filled with Soldiers, and Victuals. But as soon as the wind served, he suddenly set sail, arriving in the mouth of the Meuse, turned up the Rhine, and thence to Tijl, and late down before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march over land round about Holland, above four score mile, and over many great Rivers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Again, when the Spanish Army had overcome this wearisome march, and were now far from home, Prince Maurice, making countenance to sail up the Rhine, changed his course in the night, and falling down the stream, he was set down before Hulst in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Town he also took, before the Spanish Army could return. Lastly, the Spanish Army was no sooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince of Maurice, well attended by his good Fleet, having fortified Hulst, set sail again, and performed him (before Nymegen in Gelder, a City of notable importance, and maltered it.

And to say the truth, it is impossible for any maritime Country, not having the Coasts admirably fortified, to defend it self against a powerful enemy, that is Master of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spain than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second had fully resolved to hinder Sir Johannes Norris in the year 1589. from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugal, before the gates of Lisbon; and that he would have kept off the English, by power of his Land-Forces; as being too weak at Sea, through the great overthrow of his mighty Armada, by the Fleet of Queen Elizabeth, in the year foregoing. Surely, it had not been hard for him, to prepare an Army, that should be able to resist our eleven Thousand. But where should this Army have been bestowed? If about Lisbon; then would it have been ealie unto the English, to take, ransack, and burn the Town of Corn, and to waste the Countrey round about it. For the great and threatening preparations of the Earl of Arundell, the Marquess of Sarabia, and others did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the hostility of eight Thousand under the Earl of Arundell.

Arada, serve to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sir John Norris, and his Associates: Considering that the English charged there, at Puente de Burger, and passing the great Bridge, behind which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricaded at the further end, routed them, took their Camp; took their General Standard with the Kings Arms, and pursued them over all the Country, which they fired. If a Royal Army, and not (as this was) a Company of private adventurers, had thus begun the War in Galicia, I think it would have made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugal, and make haste to the defence of their St. Jago, whose Temple was not far from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution, as knowing, that Sir John Norris his main intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Army into his Kingdom, whither coming strong, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed. Could they have hindered his landing in Portugal? Did not he land at Peniche, and march over the Country to Lisbon, six dayes journey? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) pass along the River of Lisbon to Casalcas, and there, having won the Fort, quickly imbarque his men, and depart? But these, though no more than an handful, yet were they Englishmen. Let us consider of the matter it self, what another Nation might do, even against England, in landing an Army, by advantage of a Fleet, if we had none. This question, Whether an invading Army may be resisted at their landing upon the Coast of England, were there no Fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it, is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his observations upon Cajars Commentaries, that maintains the affirmative. This he holds only upon supposition; in absence of our Shipping: And comparatively, as that is to ensure safe and easy course, to defend all the Coast of England, than to suffer any enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keep our enemies from treading upon our ground; wherein, if we fail, then must we seek to make him with, that he had stayed at his own home. In such a case, if it should happen, our judgments are to weigh many particular circumstances, that belongs not unto this discourse. But making the question general, and positive, Whether England, without the help of her Fleet, be able to debar an enemy from landing, I hold that it is unable so to do: And therefore I think it most dangerous to make the adventure. For the inauguration of a first Victory to an enemy, and the discouragement of being beaten to the invaded, may draw after it a most perilous consequence.

It is true, that the Marshal Monsieur, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complain, that by his warring Forces, wherewith to have kept the frontier of Gyenne, that of the Protestant Religion, after the Battel of Moncontour, entered that Country, and gathered great strength and relief thence; for if the King (saith he) would have given me but reasonable means, j'euſſe bien gardé a Monsieur l'Admiral de faire boire ses Chevaux en la Garonne: I would have kept the Admiral from warring his Horses in the River of Garonne. Monsieur de Languey, on the contrary side, prefers the not fighting upon a frontier with an invading enemy, and commends the delay; which course the Countess of France held against the Emperor Charles, when he invaded Provence. Great difference I know theris, and a diverse consideration to be had, between such a Country as France is, strengthened with many fortified places: And this of ours where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of invasions upon firm land, that these great Captains spake: whose entrances cannot be uncertain. But our question is an Army to be transported over Sea, and to be landed again in an enemies Country, and the place left to the choice of the invader. Hereunto I say, that such an Army cannot be relied on the Coast of England, without a Fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the Coast of France, or any other Country: Except every Creek, Port, or sandy Bay, had a powerful Army, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted; that Ken is able to furnish twelve Thou. land foot, and those twelve Thousand be layed in the three best landing places within that Country, to wit, three Thousand at Margat, three Thousand at the Nesse, and six Thousand at Fulkeston, that is somewhat equally distant from them both, as also that two of these Troops (unless some other order be thought more fit) be directed to strengthen the third, when they shall see the enemies Fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this provision, if the enemy, setting sail from the Isle of Wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long Boats at their Sterns, shall arrive by dawn of day at the Nesse, and thrust their Army on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat (twenty and four long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellows at the Nesse. Nay, how should they at Fulkeston be able to do it, who are nearer by more than half the way? seeing that the enemy, at his first arrival, will either make his entrance by force, with three or four Hundred shot of great Artillery, and quickly put the first three Thousand, that were intrenched at the Nesse, to run; or else give him so much to do, that they shall be glad to fend for help to Fulkeston, and perhaps to Margat: whereby those places will be left bare. Now let us suppose, that all the twelve Thousand Kenish Soldiers arrive at the Nesse, ere the enemy can be ready to dis-embarque his Army, so that he will find it unsafe, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withstand him: yet must we believe, that he will play the best of his own game (having liberty to go which way he list) under cover of the night, set sail towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more easy than to do it. Yea, the like may be said of Wymouth, Parbeck, Port, and of all landing places on the South Coast. For there is no man ignorant, that Ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily overrun the Soldiers that coast them. Les armes ne violent point en poste; Armes neither fly, nor run post, saith a Marshal of France. And I know it to be true, that a Fleet of Ships may be seen at San-fere, and after it, at the Lisard; yet by the next morning they may recover Portland, whereas an Army of foot shall not be able to march it in six dayes. Again, when those troops lodged on the Sea-shores, shall be forced to run from place to place in vain, after a Fleet of Ships; they will at length sit down in the mid-way; and leave all at adventure. But say it were otherwise; that the invading enemy will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Army of ours ready to receive him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our Trained Bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, shall be drawn together (as they were at Tilbury in the year 1588.) to attend the

the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the City of London: They that remain to guard the Coast can be of no such force, as to encounter an Army like unto that wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should have landed in England.

The Isle of Terceira hath taught us by experience, what to think in such a case. There are not many Islands in the World, better fenced by nature, and strengthened by Art: it being every where hard of access; having no good harbour whereto to shelter a Navy of friends, and upon every cove or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies Boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylva, and Monsieur de Chaites, that held it to the use of Don Antonio, with five or six Thousand men, thought to have kept the Marques of Santa Cruz, from setting foot on ground therein; the Marques having shewed himself in the Road of Angra, did let fall, ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Fort des Males, far distant from thence; where he was a Fort, and landed ere Monsieur de Chaites, running thither in vain, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Straffe, slain the year before, without all regard of his worth, and of three Hundred French Prisoners murdered in cold blood; had instructed de Chaites, and his followers, what they might expect at that Marques his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying in relief to Fort des Males. Whether our English would be persuaded to make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and back again, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Terceira; whereof the Frenchmen had not measured the one half when they found themselves prevented by the more nimble Ships of Spain.

This may suffice to prove, that a strong Army, in a good Fleet, which neither foot nor horse is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England, France, or elsewhere, unless it be hindered, encountered, and shuffed together, by a Fleet of equal or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the year 1597. is alleged against this: which example moves me no way to think, that a large Coast may be defended against a strong Fleet. I landed those English in Fayal my self, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I find an Action of mine cited, with omission of my name; I may, by a civil interpretation, think, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprise was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due unto it. There were indeed some which were in that Voyage, who advised me not to undertake it: And I hearkened unto them somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilst they desired me to reserve the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficulty, I gave them to understand, the same which I now maintain, that it was more difficult to defend a Coast, than to invade it. The truth is, that I could have landed my men with more ease than I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would have rowed to another place; yea even there where I landed, if I would have taken more company to help me. But, without our fearing any imputation of rashness, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation in that business, than of safety. For I thought it to belong unto the honour of our Prince and Nation, that a few Islanders should not thing any advantage great enough, against a Fleet set forth by Elizabeth: And further, I was unwilling, that some Low-Country Captains, and others, not of mine own Squadron, whose alliance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceit (though it would have been short; when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their help I was driven to turn tail. Therefore I took with me none, but men assured, Commanders of mine own Squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, Voluntaries, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brook, Sir William Harvey, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Skot, Sir Thomas Bridgeway, Sir Henry Tenny, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marsellus Throckmorton, Captain Lawrence Kenis, Captain William Morcan, and other such as well understood themselves and the enemy: By whose help, with Gods favour, I made good the enterprise I undertook. As for the working of the Sea, the deepness of the Cliffs, and other troubles that were not new to us, we overcame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made five or six Companies of the enemies, that fought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whercon their Musketeers lay on the Rest for us, and won the place of them without any great loss. This could have done with less danger, so that it should not have served for example of a Rule, that failed even in this example. But the reasons before alleged (together with other reasons well known to some of the Gentlemen above named, though more private than to be here laid down) made me rather follow the way of bravery, and take the shorter course; having it fill in mine own power to fall off when I should think it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemy was more than a Comards; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small piece of service, by seeking to prove him better: whom had I thought equal to mine own followers, I would otherwise have dealt with. But for so much as concerns the proposition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember that the same enemy troubled us more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore, that he sought how to stop us in place of his advantage, that many of our men were slain or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to be past) when he had won good footing) would needs follow us to the Town, were driven by him, to forsake the place of a man of War, and betake themselves to an hasty trot.

For end of this Digression, I hope that this question shall never come to ryal; his Majesties many moveable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no less disdain, than any Nation under Heaven can do, to be beaten upon their own ground, or elsewhere by a foreign enemy; yet to entertain those that shall assail us, with their own Bief in their bellies, and before they eat of our Kenish Capons, I take it to be the wisest way. To do which, his Majesty after God, will employ his good Ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment upon the shore.

SECT. X.

How the Romans attempt again to get the Mastery of the Seas. The Victory of Cælius the Roman Consul at Panormus: The siege of Lilybæum. How a Rhodian Gally entered Lilybæum at pleasure, in despite of the Roman Fleet. That it is a matter of great difficulty to stop the passage of good Ships. The Romans, by reason of grievous losses received under Claudius and Junius their Consuls, abandon the Seas again.

When without a strong Navy, the Romans found it altogether impossible, either to keep what they had already gotten in Sicily, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa, or elsewhere; they resolved once again, notwithstanding their late misadventures, to strengthen their Fleet, and so causing fifty new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gave them in charge (together with certain Legions of Soldiers) to the new Consuls, C. Attilius and L. Manlius. On the other side, Adribal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reason of the Shipwrack which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the overthrow which they received by Xanthippus in Africa, were less daring than they had been in the beginning of the War: And withal, that one of the Consuls was returned into Italy, with the one half of the Army, and that Cælius, with only the other half, remained at Panormus; he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybæum towards it, hoping to provoke Cælius to fight. But the Consul was better advised. For when Adribal had made his approaches somewhat near the Town, Cælius caused a deep trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the City: Between which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattle a Legion of his Soldiers. To the effect he gave order that they should advance themselves, and pass over the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust upon them. From those Beasts he commanded them to retire by slow degrees till they had drawn on the Elephants to the brink of the new trench, which they could by no means pass. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so gawled and beaten, both by those Soldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench itself, that being enraged by their many wounds, they brake back furiously upon their own foot-men, and utterly disordered them. Cælius elying his advantage; fallied with all the force he had; and charging the other Troops, that stood embattailed, he utterly brake them, and put them to their heels; making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this Victory being brought to Rome; the whole State filled with courage, prepared a new Fleet of two Hundred sail, which they sent into Sicily, to give end to that War, that had now lasted fourteen years. With his Fleet and Army the Romans resolved to attempt Lilybæum, the only place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicily; and all (indeed) save Drepanum, that was next adjoining. They set down before it, and possessed themselves of all the places of advantage near unto it, especially of such as command the Haven, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground the Towers of defence; and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the City, as the defendants begin to despair. Yet Himiles, Commander of the place, faithless not in all that belongs to a man of War. All that is broken he repaired with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giveth to the Romans all the affronts that possible could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten Thousand Soldiers; among which there are certain Lieutenants, and other petty Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Town. But the matter is revealed by an Achaean, called Alexon, who had formerly been in danger of the like Treason, saved Agri-genum. Himiles useth the help of Alexon, to assure the hired Soldiers, and employs Hannibal to appease the Troops of the Gauls, which did waver; and had sent their agents to the enemy. All promise constancy and truth; so that the Traitors, being unable to perform what they had undertaken, are fain to live in the Roman Camp as fugitives, that had wrought no good whereby to deserve their bread. In the mean while, a supply of ten Thousand Soldiers is sent from Carthage to their relief, having Hannibal the Son of Antioch for their Conductor: who, in despite of all resistance, entered the Port and City, to the incredible joy of the besieged. The old Soldiers, together with the new Companies (thereto perswaded by Himiles with hope of great reward) resolved to set upon the Romans in their trenches, and either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire their Engines of Battery. The attempt is presently made, and purified to the uttermost, with great laughter on both sides. But the Romans, being more, in number, and having the advantage of the ground, hold till their places, and with extreme difficulty defend their Engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to understand the state of things at Lilybæum; but know not how to find into the Town. A certain Rhodian undertakes the service, and having received his dispatch, sails with one Gally to Agusa, a little Island near Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time he steered directly with the Port; and having a passing swift Gally, he past through the best of the Channel, and recovered the water-gate ere any of those which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the covert of the dark night, nor dreading to be boarded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his return, he set sail, and shipped his Oars (his Gally being exceeding quick of steering, and himself expert in all parts of the Channel) recovered the Havens mouth, and the Sea, in despite of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himself out of danger of being encompassed by many, he turned again towards the mouth of the Haven, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth to undertake him. This enterprise, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondered at in those days: And yet, where there was no great Artillery, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill afar off, the adventure which this Rhodian made was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and judicious man of War will not fear to pass by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the help of a good Tide, and a leading gale of wind: No, though forty pieces of great Artillery upon their mounds assault him, and threaten to tear him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queens time, when Denmark and Sweden were at War, our East-land Fleet, bound for Lef-land, was forbidden by the King

King of Denmark to trade with the subjects of his Enemies, and he threatened to sink their Ships if they came through the straits of Elfenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (having a Ship of her Majesties, called the Minion, to defend them) made the adventure, and sustaining some Volleys of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the Provision he could to stop them, or sink them at their return. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrage, leading the way, did not only pass out with little loss, but did beat down, with Artillery, a great part of the Fort of Elfenour; which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: And the Fleet of Merchants that followed, were through without any wound received. Neither was it long, since that the Duke of Parma, besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibility to master it, otherwise than by Famine, laid his Cannon on Bank of the River, so well to purpose, and so even with the face of the Water, that he thought it impossible for the least Boat to pass by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blown up by any wind of glory, but coming to find a good Market for their Butter and Cheese, even the poor men, attending their profit when all things were extrem dear in Antwerp, passed in Boats of Ten or Twelve Tuns, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despite of it; when a strong Wester-ly Wind, and a Tide of Flood favoured them; as also with a contrary Wind, and an Ebbing Water, they turned back again: So as he was forced, in the end, to build his Stockadoe overhwart the River, to his marvellous trouble and charge.

The Fort Saint Philip terrified not us in the Year 1596, when we entered the Port of Calix, neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entered, beat us from our anchoring by it; though it plaid upon us with Four Demi-Cannons within point-blank, from six in the Morning till twelve at noon. The Siege of Ochoana, and of many other places, may be given for proof, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good Ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so set, as that of Agusa in Trevera, that there is no passage along beside it, or that the Ships are driven to turn upon a bow-line towards it, wanting all help of Wind and Tide; there, and in such places, it is of great use, and fearful: otherwise not.

But to return to our adventurous Rodian: He arrives in safety at Carthage, and makes them know the estate of Lilybæum. Others also, after this, take upon them to do the like, and perform it with the same success. The Romans therefore labour to choke the Channel; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants Ships with great Stones, and sink them therein. The force of the Tydes clear it again in part: But they grounded so many of those great belied-Boats in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest riling and heave, like a ragged Island in the passage. Hereby it came to pass, that a Carthaginian Gally, taking her course by Night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ran herself aground thereon, and was taken. Now comes that brave Rhodian, thinking to enter, as he had done before: But this Carthaginian Gally, a little before taken, gave him chase, and gathered upon him, he finds what the is, both by her form, and by her swiftness: And being not able to run from her, resolved to fight with her. But she is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybæum, after this, is greatly distressed, the Soldiers being worn with labour and watching.

But in this despair there rose so violent a Tempest, as some of the Roman Wooden-Towers, by which they over-top the walls of Lilybæum, were overturned. A Greek Soldier undertakes to fire those that were fallen, and perform it: For the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blown unto by the bellows of a Tempest, it increased so fast, as it became restifles, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the Brazen heads of the battering Rams. Hereupon, despair and weariness hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: So that they resolve, by a long Siege, to starve the defendants.

Upon relation of what had past, a supply of Ten Thousand Soldiers is sent from Rome, under M. Claudius, the Consul. He arrives at Messina, and marcheth over Land to Lilybæum: Where having re-inforced the Army, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprize of Drepanum, a City on the other side of the Bay of Lilybæum. This service the Captains and Soldiers willingly embrace. So the Consul embarks his Troops, and arrives on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adribal is Governour of the Town, a valiant and prudent man of War, who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at Lilybæum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but having recovered his Spirits, he perswades the Soldiers rather to fight abroad, than to be enclosed. Here-withal he promisheth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserve them; offering to lead them himself, and to fight in the head of his Fleet. Having sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrust into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consul, deceived of his expectation, calls back the foremost Gallies, that he might now marshal them for defence. Hereupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adribal finds and follows his advantage, and forceth the Consul into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himself, having the Land on his back: Hoping thereby to keep himself from being encompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-room, so straitened, as he could not turn himself any way from his Enemies, nor range himself in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, he thrust out of the Bay with Thirty Gallies, besides his own, and so fled away: All the rest of his Fleet, to the number of Ninety and Four Ships, were taken or sunk by the Carthaginians. Adribal for his service is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indirection and flight, as much disgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great loss, arm Threefore Gallies, with which they charge away L. Junius, their Consul, too take care of their business in Sicily. Junius arrives at Messina, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman Fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybæum. One Hundred and Twenty Gallies he had, and besides these, he had gotten together almost Eight Hundred Ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessary Provisions for the Army. With this great Fleet he arrives at Syracuse, where he stays a while; partly to take in Corn, partly to wait for some time that was too slow of Sail to keep company with him along from Messina. In the mean time he dispatched away towards Lilybæum his Quersors or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one half of his Victuallers, with some Gallies for their Convey.

Adribal was not careless after his late Victory; But studied how to use it to the best advantage.

The Ships and Prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his own Gallies he delivered Thirty to Caris, who had Three score and Ten more under his own charge; and then he went to try what good might be done against the Roman Fleet in the Haven of Lilybæum. According to his direction, Carthago suddenly enters the mouth of that Haven, where he finds the Romans more attentive to the keeping in of the Belleged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their own against another Fleet. So he chargeth them, boards, and takes some, and fires the rest. The Romans Camp takes alarm, and hastens to the rescue. But Himilco, Governour of the Town, is not behind hand, who sallies out at the same time, and putting the Romans to great distress, gives Carthago good leisure to go through with his enterprise.

After this exploit, Carthago ran all along the South Coast of Sicily, devoting how to work mischief to the Enemy; wherein Fortune presented him with a fair occasion, which he wisely managed. He was advertised by his Scouts, that they had defracted, near at hand, a great Fleet, consisting of all manner of Vessels. These were the Victuallers, which the Consul Junius, more hastily than providently, had sent before him towards Lilybæum. Carthago was glad to hear of their coming: For he and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late victories. Accounting therefore the great Multitude of Roman Hulls, approaching, to be rather a prey than a Fleet likely to make strong opposition, he hastens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no mind to fight: But were glad to seek shelter in an open Road, full of Rocks under the covert of a poor Town, belonging to their party; that could help to save them only from the present danger, by lending them Engines and other aid, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that assailed them. Carthago therefore, having taken a few of them, lay waiting for the rest, that could not long ride under those Rocks, but would be forced by any great change of Wind, either to put out into the deep, or to save their men how they could, by taking land, with the loss of all their Shipping. Whilst he was busied in this care, the Consul Junius drew near, and was discovered. Against him Carthago makes out, and finds him altogether unprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had happened. The Consul had neither means to fly, nor ability to fight. Therefore he likewise ran into a very dangerous Creek; thinking no danger so great as that of the Enemy. The Carthaginian seeing this, breaks himself too a station between the two Roman Fleets, where he watcheth, to see which of them would first stir, with a resolution to assault that, which should first dare to put itself into the Sea. So as now all the Three Fleets were on the South Coast of Sicily, between the Promontory of Pachinus and Lilybæum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the Wind stormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of Tempest, and their tides, finding (belike) some swelling Billow (for so we do in the West of England, before a Southerly Storm) halted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to cover themselves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight than how to Navigate, and never found any foul weather in the entrails of their Beasts, their South-fayers being all Land-Propheets, were suddenly overtaken with a boisterous South-wind, and all the Gallies forced against the Rocks, and utterly wrackt.

This calamity discouraged the Romans, that they relented again to forsake the Seas, and trust only to the service of their Legions upon firm ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or else they must not make War in an Island, against those that have a mightier Fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient virtue of the Spaniards. We seldom or never find, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the Spaniards have done, in their Indian Discoveries. Yet persisting in their enterprises with an invincible constancy, they have annexed to their Kingdom so many goodly Provinces, as bury the remembrance of all dangers past. Temples and Shipwracks, Famine, Overthrows, Murders, Heat and Cold, Pestilence, and all manner of diseases both old and new, together with extreme poverty, and want of all things needful, have been the Enemies wherewith every one of their most noble discoverers, at one time or other, hath encountered. Many Years have passed over some of their heads in the search of not so many Leagues: Yea more than one or two have spent their labour, their wealth, and their lives, in search of a Golden Kingdom, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the Third, Fourth, and Fifth undertakers, have not been disheartened. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasures and Paradises which they enjoy, and well they deserve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like virtues in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

SECT. XI.

The City of Eryx is surpris'd by the Romans, and recovered by Amilcar, who stoutly holds War with them Five Years. The Romans, having emptied their common Treasury, build a new Fleet at the charges of private men. The great Victory at Sea of Lucatius the Consul, whereby the Carthaginians are forced to crave Peace. The conditions of the Peace between Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were careful to supply with all industry, by Land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the Siege of Lilybæum, and seek to make lure to themselves all places, whither the Enemies Ships could not bring relief. The Consul Junius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which he had received, bethought him what enterprises to undertake. In the end he relolved to attempt the Mountain and City of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: Which was the fairest and richest of all the Island; and of these, by cunning or Treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated between Drepanum and Panormus, so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restrain the Carthaginians from making Roads into the Country. Wherefore Junius fortified both the top of the Mountain, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottom, (both of which places were very defensible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the Eighteenth Year of this War, the Carthaginians set forth Amilcar, surnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a Fleet and Army, who sailing to the Coast of Italy, did thoroughly repay the spoils which the Romans made in Africa. For he first of all waited and destroyed the Territories of the Locrians, and of the Bruttians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entered he into Sicily, and finding there no Walled City in the Carthaginians power, that served fitly to insult the Romans, he occupied a piece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Army thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himself between both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilcar had seized upon, was not only very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: Wherby it gave him opportunity to scour all the Coast of Italy with his Fleet, waiting all along as far as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicily he held the Romans to hard work, lying near unto Panormus: Where in Three Years abode, he did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the Enemy could never be drawn to hazard the main chance. Having wearied himself and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he undertook a strange piece of work at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Junius, on the top, and at the bottom of the Mountain, were very strongly lodged. Nevertheless Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which he conveyed his men into the City of Eryx, that was above the main of the island, ere the Enemy knew of it. By this it came to pass, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountain, were straightly held (as it were) Begged: And no less was Amilcar himself restrained by both of these Garrisons, and such as came to relieve them. There he found them patient about Two Years more, hoping still to weary out those that lay over his head, as they on the contrary did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent unto the prosecuting of his business at Eryx. Whereto it seems true (as Hannibal in Letter, spake unto Scipio) that the affairs of Carthage never stood in better terms, since the beginning of the War, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had utterly forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly upon condence of their Land-Forces, which they held resolute; Amilcar, with a small Army, had so well acquired himself; to the honour of his Country, that by the trial of Five Years War, the Carthaginian Soldier was judged equal if not superior to the Roman. Finally, when all that might be, had been devised and done, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warrior: No way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once again to build a Fleet, whereby, if the mastery of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lack of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficulty was found. The common Treasury was exhausted: And the cost was not little, that was requisite unto such an enterprise. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden upon private Purfes. Divers of the principal Citizens undertook to build (each at his own charges.) One Quinquarum, which example wrought so well, that they, whose ability would not serve to do the like, joined with some others, and laying their Monies together, concurred Two or Three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repayed, when the War was finished. By this voluntary contribution, they made and finished Two Hundred new Quinquarums: Taking for their Pattern, that excellent swift rowing Gallies which they had gotten from the Rodians, in the Port of Lilybæum, as was shewed before. In the charge of this Fleet was committed to C. Lucatius Carinus, who pass with the same into Sicily the Spring following, and entered the Port of Drepanum; endeavoring by all means to have forced the City. But being advertised that the Carthaginian Fleet was at hand, and being mindful of the late losses which his Predecessors had received; he was careful to put himself in order, against their arrival.

Hanno was Admiral of the Carthaginian Fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wise in picture, exceedingly formal, and skillful in the Art of seeming reverend. How his reputation was first bred, I do not find; but it was upheld by a fictitious contradiction, of things undertaken by men more worthy than himself. This quality procured unto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient sort, whose cold temper is averse from new enterprises; and therewithal an opinion of great fortitude, confirmed by very loss received. More particularly, he was gracious among the People, for that he was one of the most grievous oppressors of their subject Provinces; wherby he procured unto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithal such hatred, as turned it all to their great loss. He had ere this been employed against the Numidians and wild Africans, that were more like to Rovers than to Souldiers, in making War. Of those fugitive Nations he learned to neglect more manly Enemies, to his own great disadvantage, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counsel, when, having shewed himself an unworthy Captain, he betook himself to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to preserve the League between Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well he deserved of his own Country, it will appear hereafter: How beneficial he was to the Romans, it will appear, both hereafter, and in this present Voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessity of accepting, upon hard conditions, that Peace which he therewith commended.

Hanno had very well furnished his Navy, with all needful Provisions for the Souldiers at Eryx (for dexterity in making preparation was the best of his qualities): But he had neither been careful in training his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with four fellows. He thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian Fleet was enough, to make the unexpert Romans give way: Forgetting, that rather the resolute force of Tempests, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to forsake the Seas. Yet in one thing he had either conceived aright, or else was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to fail to Eryx, and there to discharge his Ships of their lading: And having thus lightened himself, he meant to take aboard some part of the Land-Army, together with Amilcar himself, by whose help he doubted not, but that he should be able to make his Enemy repent of his new adventure to Sea. This was a good course, if it could have been performed. But Carthago used all possible diligence, to prevent the execution of this design: Nor because he was informed of the Enemies purpose, but that he knew it to be the best for them, and for that he feared no danger so greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian Fleet was decyred; yet he rather chose to fight with the Enemies, that had the Wind of him, than to suffer his Convoy to pass along to Eryx, upon unlikely hope of better opportunity in the future. All that Hanno should have done, Caesar had performed. He had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; he had lightened his Gallies of all unnecessary burthens; and he had taken aboard the choice men of his Roman Land-Souldiers. The Carthaginian; therefore, at the first encounter were utterly broken and defeated, having Fifty of their Gallies stemmed and sunk, and Seventy taken, wherein were few less than Ten Thousand men, that were all made Prisoners: The rest, by a sudden change of Wind, escaping to the Isle of Hierosus.

The State of Carthage, utterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to resolve. Means to repair their Fleet in any time, there were none left; their best men of War by Sea were consumed; and Amilcar, upon whose valour and judgement the honour and safety of the Common-wealth rested, was now surrounded by his Enemies in Sicily, where he could not be relieved. In this extremity, they make dispatch unto Amilcar himself, and authorized him to take what course should seem best unto his excellent wisdom, leaving all conclusions to his election and sole counsel.

Amilcar, whom no adversity, accompanied with the least hope or possibility of recovery, had ever vanquished, looking over every promise, true or false, that the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future he was not able) resolved to make trial, whether his necessity might be compounded upon any reasonable terms. He therefore sent to Lutatius the Consul an overture of Peace: Who considering it well, gathered up many arguments from the present poverty of the Roman State, valued beyond expectation in the former War: that he readily harkened unto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with Provision, That it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: First, That the Carthaginians should clearly abandon the Isle of Sicily. Secondly, That they should never undertake upon Hieros King of Syracuse, nor invade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, That they should set at liberty, and send back in Italy, all the Romans, whom they held Prisoners, without Ransom. Lastly, That they should pay unto the Romans Two Thousand and Two Hundred Talents; which make, as the French reckon the Talent, Thirteen Hundred and Twenty Thousand Crowns, the same to be delivered with Twenty Years next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not thoroughly approved: But Ten Commissioners were sent into Sicily, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a Thousand Talents to the former sum; and required a shorter time of payment. Further also they took order, that the Carthaginians should not only depart out of Sicily in self, but should also withdraw their Companies out of all other Islands between it and Italy, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such was the end of the first Punic War, that had lasted about Twenty Four Years without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or Shipwrack, about Seven Hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians about Five Hundred: The greatness of which losses, doth serve to prove the greatness both of these two Cities, and of the War it self; wherein I hold good the judgment of Polybins, That the Romans, in general, did shew themselves the braver Nation; and Amilcar, the most worthy Captain.

CHAP. II.

Of divers actions passing between the First and Second Punic Wars.

SECT. I.

Of the cruel War begun between the Carthaginians and their own Mercenaries.

THE Romans having partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicily, and all the little Islands thereunto adjacent, gave them rather means and leisure to help themselves in a following War, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present Peace. It is an ancient and true rule, Quod leges a vitiosis duntaxat accipiuntur a iustis; That Laws are given by the Conquerors, and received of the Conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made unto them, by one of the Privernates for else had forgotten to follow it in this weighty business. For when one of Privernum, after a Rebellion, defending in the Senate the Cause of his City, was demanded by a Senator, What Peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present advantage over them; he answered in those words, Si bonam desideris, & fidem & gratiam; si fidem, haud desinam; si fidem, haud desinam; si fidem, haud desinam. If the Peace be good and faithful that you give us, it will be perpetual; if it be ill, there of little continuance. To this answer answer the Senate, at that time gave such approbation, that it was said, *Viri & liberi vocem audiant; An crederi possit, illum populum, aut hominem denique in ea conditione, cuius cum pariter, diutius quam inesse sit manifestum? That was the speech of a manly and free man; for who could believe, that any People, or indeed any one Man, would continue longer in an over-burdened estate, than meer necessity did enforce? Now, if the Romans themselves could make this judgment of those Nations, who had little else belied their manly resolution, to defend their liberty, surely they grossly flattered themselves, in presuming that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferior unto themselves, would sit down any longer by the loss and dishonour received, than until they could recover their legs, and the strength which had a while failed them to take revenge. But occasion, by which (while well entertained) not only private men but Kings and publick States, have more prevailed, than by any proper prowess or virtue, with-held the Tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearfully upon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.*

For after the first Punic War was ended, Amilcar, leaving Eryx, went to Lilybaeum, from whence most conveniently the Army might be transported into Africa: The care of which business he committed unto Gisco, to whom, as to a man of approved sufficiency, he delivered over his charge. Gisco had an especial consideration of the great sums, wherein Carthage was indebted unto these Mercenaries; and withal, of the great disability to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them over (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time; that so the first might have their discharge, and be gone, ere the Second or Third Companies arrived. Herein he dealt providently. For it had not been hard to perwade any small number, lodged within so great a City as Carthage, unto some such reasonable composition, as the present empins of the common Treasury did require: so that the first might have been friendly discharged, and a good president left unto the Second and Third, whilst their disjunction had made them unable to recover their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrary opinion. They thought to find, in the whole Army, some that would be contented to gratifie the Publick State, by remitting a great part of their own due: And hoped, by such an example, to draw all the Multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they decained the first and second companies; telling them, that they would make an even reckoning with all together. Thus every day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the City, not accustomed unto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other place, where they might be less troublesome. This must be done by some colourable words of perswasion: For their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too far. Wherefore it is devised, that they should all attend the coming of their fellows, at Sicca: Receiving every one a piece of Gold, to bear his charges in the mean while.

This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers began to dilodge; leaving behind them their Wives, their Children, and all their Baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians have no fancy to their returning into the Town; and therefore compel them to trust up their fardels, that they might have none occasion left to make any Errands thither. So to Sicca they removed, with all their goods: And there lay waiting for news of their fellows arrival, and their own pay. Business they had none to do, and therefore might easily be drawn to munity: The whole argument of it is discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talk was, how rich they should be, when all their money came in; how much would fall to every single share, and for how long time the City was behind hand with them in reckoning. They were all grown Arithmeticians; and he was thought a man of worth, that could find most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, even beyond their due. No part of their long service was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captains, leading them forth to any dangerous Fight, were called to mind, and so many Obligations, not to be cancelled without satisfying their expectation by some extraordinary largess.

Thus the time passeth away, until the whole Army being arrived, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to clear the account. Now is the day come, wherein they shall be all made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining assemble themselves to hear what good news this Messenger had brought, with a full resolution to help his memory, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made to them; all which were to be considered in their Donative. Hanno begins a very formal Oration; wherein he bewails the poverty of Carthage, tells them how great a sum of Money is to be paid unto the Romans; reckons up the excessive charges wherewith the Common-wealth had been in the late War; and finally desires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out of the love which they bare unto the City, to remit the rest. Few of them understood his discourse: For the Carthaginian Army was composed of sundry Nations, as Greeks, Africans, Gauls, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others; all of different Languages. Yet they stared upon him, and were (as I think) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such as conceived the whole tenour of his Speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad-men, so that nothing would serve to appease them.

Hanno would fain have asswaged their fury, but he knew not how: For he less understood their dissolvent loud noises, than they did his Oration. An Army collected out of so many Countries, that have no one Language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred up to Murine, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into out-rage. The best that Hanno can do, is to use the help of Interpreters and Messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning; some for want of skill; others of set purpose; and such as deliver his Errands in the worst fence, are best believed. Finally, they think themselves much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolve to demand their own in peremptory terms, at a nearer distance. In this mood they leave Sicca, and march as far as Tanis, that is within a very little of Carthage, and there they encamp.

Now begin the Carthaginians to find their own error. It is a good Rule, Curandum imprimis, ne magna in iuria fiat Fortibus & miseris.

Have

Have special care, that valiant poverty
Be not oppress'd with too great injury.

But this proud City, having neglected the Rule, hath also been careless in providing to secure her self against the inconvenience that might follow. She had suffered the whole Multitude, whereupon she was like to give cause of discontent, to join it easily into one body, when the several Troops might easily have been dispersed: She hath turned out of her Gates the Wives, Children, and goods of these poor men, which, had she retained in shew of kindness, she might have used them as hostages for her own safety; and by employing a miserable penny-father, in her Negotiation with men of War, she hath weakened the reputation of her bravest Captains, that might best have served to free her from the threatening danger. Yet likely it is, that Amilcar had no desire to be used as an instrument in defrauding his own Soldiers of their wages: Especially considering, that as he best could bear witness of their merits, so was he not ignorant, that means to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had been willing thereunto. Hereupon may be added a probable conjecture that Hanno, with his complies, who at this very time was a bitter enemy to Amilcar, had the boldness to impose the blame of his own wretched counsel upon the liberal promises made by the Captains. Amilcar therefore did wisely, in suffering those that maligned him, to have the managing of their own plot, and to deal the Cards which themselves had shuffled. This they continue to do as foolishly as they had at first begun. They furnish a Market at Tunis, for the Soldiers, whom they suffer to buy what they list, and at what price they list. They send ever and anon some of their Senators into the Camp, who promise to satisfy all demands, as far forth as it should be possible. And thus by shifting from one extrem to another, they make the Soldiers understand into what fear the City was driven; which cannot chuse but add much infoleny to the passions already stirred up.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the Army, which thereupon grows wild, and finding the season fit, labours to make a great Harvest. Money must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many have lost their Horses in publick service of the State. The State shall pay for them. They had lived some Years by making hard shifts, without receiving their allowance of Victuals from Carthage. If they had lived, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the Ships did bring in Provision, or their Captains direct them where to fetch it? But this would not serve. They said that they had been sometimes driven to buy; and that (since they could not remember how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their Provision during the whole time, and according to the dearest price that Wheat had born, whilst the War lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiniers; who might easily have been satisfied with far less charges, and far more honour, by receiving their due at the first. But now they make no end of craving. For whilst the Carthaginians are perplexed about this Corn-money, the Soldiers have devised many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater sum of Money, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could be found of these controversies which daily did multiply, it was thought convenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicily, should be chosen by the Soldiers to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Army consented, and made choice of Gisco: partly out of good liking to him, who had shewed himself at all times, a friendly man to them, and careful of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africa; partly out of a dislike which they had conceived of Amilcar, for that he had not vilified them in all this busy time. So Gisco comes among them; and to please them the better, comes not without Money: Which might give better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the Negotiation of Hanno. He calls unto him first all the Captains, and then the several Nations apart, rebuking them gently for that which had passed; advising them temperately concerning the present; and exhorting them to continue their love unto their State, which had long entertained them, and would needs always be mindful of their good services. After this he began to put hand to his Purse, offering to give them their whole pay in hand; and then after to confider of other reckonings at a more convenient time. This had been well accepted, and might have served to bring all to a quiet pass, if two feditious Ring-leaders of the multitude had not stood against it.

There was in the Camp one Spendius, a sturdy fellow, and audacious, but a Slave; that in the late War had fled from a Rome, where he served, and therefore stood in fear, lest he should be delivered back to his Master; at whose hands he could expect no less, than to be Whipt and Crucified. This wretch could find no better way to prolong his own life, than by raising such troubles as might serve to withdraw men from care of private matters, and make his own restitution impossible, were his Master never so importunate. With Spendius there associated himself one Matho, an hot-headed man, that had been so forward in stirring up the Tumult, as he could not chide but fear, lest his own death should be made an example, to deter others from the like feditious behaviour. This Matho deals with his Countrymen the Africans, telling them, that they were in far worse condition, than either the Gauls, the Greeks, the Spaniards, or any foreign Mercenaries. For (saith he) These our companions have no more to do, than to receive their Wages, and forget them gone: But we that are to stay behind in Africa, shall be collected another manner of Account, when we are left alone; so that we shall have cause to wish that we had returned home Beggars, rather than laden with the Money, which (little though it be) shall break our backs. Ye are not ignorant, how tyrannically these our haughty Masters of Carthage do Reign over us. They think it reasonable, that our lives and goods should be at their disposition, which they have at other times been accustomed to take from us even without apparent cause, as it were to declare their sovereignty: What wilt thou now do, seeing that we have demeaned our selves as Free-men, and been bold to set a good face on the matter, demanding our own, as others have done? To all do know, that it were a very humble for us, by having been as forward in every danger of War, as any other men: we should now stand quaking like Slaves, and not dare to open our mouths, when others take liberty to require their due. This notwithstanding ye may assure your selves, that we will be taught better manners; as soon as our Fellows are gone: in regard of whom they are content to shadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance.

Let

Let us therefore be wise, and consider that they hate and fear us: Their hatred will flow in self when their fear is once past: Unless we now take our time, and whilst we are the stronger, enforce them so greatly, that their hatred shall not be able to do us wrong. All their strength consisteth in money, wherewithal they have hired others against us, and us against others. At the present they have neither money nor friends. The best Army that ever served them, wherof we are no small part, lies at their gates, ready to help us if we be men. A better opportunity cannot be expected; for were our Swords once drawn, all Africa would rise on our side. As for the Carthaginians, whether can they find for help? The case is self plain. But we must quickly resolve. Either we must prevent the diligence of Gisco, by incensing these Gauls and Spaniards, and procuring them to draw blood; or else it behoveth us to please our good Masters, by joining with them against our fellows, yea by offering to forgive unto them all our wages, if so (peradventure) they may be won to forgive us, or not over-cruelly to punish our faults committed. He is most worthy a wretched Slave, that neither hath care to win his Masters love, nor the courage to attempt his own liberty.

By such persuasions Matho wins the African Soldiers to his own purpose. They are not now so greedy of money, as of quarrel, which he that seeketh not nor mits to find. When Gisco therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demands, for Horses and Victuals, to some other more convenient time; they brake into great outrage, and say, that they will have all, even all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Army flock together about Matho and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting to add more fuel to the fire already blazing. Matho and Spendius are the only men to whom the Soldiers will hearken: If any other stand up to make a speech, a shower of stones, flying about his ears, puts him to silence, that he shall never afterwards speak word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say; enough hath been said already by those good spokes-men; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can be heard, save only throw, throw.

Now the rebellion begins to take form. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captains; who, followed by a desperate crew of Ruffians, will suffer no man to make his own peace, but pursue their own ends, under fair pretence of the common cause. All which notwithstanding, Gisco is not wanting to their fury. One while he deals with the Captains, and other principal men; taking them by the hand, and giving gentle words: Another while, he works with the several Nations; putting them all in hope of their own hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so fallen as the Africans: Indeed none of them had so good cause: They require him peremptorily to give them their own, and not to feed them with words. The truth is, that they are not so covetous as they seem: But will be more glad of an ill answer, than of a good payment. This is more than Gisco knows: He sees not that Matho hath any more than bare words to bestow upon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconsiderate heat, he tells them, that they may do well, if they stand in want of money, to seek it of their Captain Matho. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and deride them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands upon the treasure that he had brought; yea upon him also, and all that are with him: As intending to take this in part of payment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellows begin to grow calm, by his fair language: Wherefore they call into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can find; that to the Army may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this follows open War. Matho solicits all Africa, and his Embassadors are everywhere well entertained. Neither is it needful to use persuasion: The very fame of this Rebellion sufficient to draw the whole Country into it. Now must the Carthaginians be plagued for those offences, with which they have plagued others. It is true that adversity hath never been untold of her errors: And as she is ever assured to hear her own; so commonly with her own she undergoes those of other men. The Africans finding the Carthaginians hang under the wheel, tell them boldly, that their Impositions were mercies, that they took from them the one half of their own; that they doubled their Tributes in all things else; and that they inflicted upon their Vassals the greatest punishment for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselves have forgotten: But the people, that have suffered so much, retain all in perfect memory. Wherefore not only such as can bear arms, are ready to do service in this great commotion; but the very women bring forth their Jewels, and other Ornaments, offering all to fail for the maintenance of so just a quarrel. By this great forwarding, and liberal contribution; Matho and Spendius are supplied with a strong aid of threecore and ten Thousand Africans: And are moreover furnished with money, not only to satisfy the present appetite of their men; but sufficient to continue the War begun, though it should be of long endurance.

SECT. II.

Divers Observations upon this War with the Mercenaries.

†. I.

Of Tyranny, and how Tyrants are fain to use the help of Mercenaries.

HERE let us rest a while, as in a convenient place, whence we may take a prospect of the subject, over which we travel. Behold a Tyrannical City, persecuted by her own Mercenaries with a deadly War. It is a common thing, as being the most necessary, that a Tyranny should be upheld by Mercenary forces: It is common that Mercenaries should be false: And it is common that all War made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and cruelty. Yet we seldom hear, that ever the ruin of a Tyranny is procured or fought by those that were hired to maintain the power of it: And seldom or never do we read of any War that hath been prosecuted with such inexplicable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyranny, is, a violent form of Government, not respecting the good of the Subject; but only the pleasure of the Commander: I purposely forbear to say that it is, the unjust rule of one over many. For very truly doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the Athenians, that their dominion over their subjects, was none other, than a near Tyranny; though it were so, that they themselves were a great City, and a popular estate. Neither is it peradventure greatly needful, that I should call this form of commanding, violent: since it may well and easily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience to one regardless of his life and welfare; unless himself be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of love. The practice of Tyranny is not always of a like extremity: For some Lords are more gentle than others, to their very Slaves; and he that is most cruel to some, is mild enough towards others, though it be but for his own advantage. Nevertheless, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it self unto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of several men, it is commonly seen, that the taste of sweetness drawn out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to be restrained with any limits of respect. Why should he seek out bounds to prescribe unto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten by extorting from some few: By sparing none, he should have riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deal from every one: But every one could have spared more. He hath wrung all their Purfes, and now he hath enough: But (as Covetousness is never satisfied) he thinks that all this is too little for a flock, though it were indeed a good yearly Income. Therefore he deviseth new tricks of Robbery, and is not better pleased with the gains, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this, and he knows it well: But he thinks by cruelty to change hatred into fear. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all whom he suspecteth: In which course, if he suspect none unjustly, he may be said to deal craftily; but if Innocency be not safe, how can all this make any Conspirator to stand in fear, since the Traitor is no worse rewarded than the quiet man? Wherefore he can think upon none other security, than to disarm all his Subjects; to forsake himself within some strong place; and for defence of his Person and State, to hire as many lusty Soldiers as shall be thought sufficient. These must not be of his own Country: For if not every one, yet some one or other may chance to have a feeling of the publick misery. This considered, he allures unto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most unhone that can be found; such as have neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be careful to support him, by whose only favour they are maintained. Now, least any of these, either by detection of his wickedness, or (which is wicked men is most likely) by the promise of greater reward than he doth give, should be drawn to turn his Sword against the Tyrant himself: They shall all be permitted to do as he doth; to Rob, to Ravish, to Murder, and to satisfy their own appetites, in most outrageous manner, being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more he sees them grow hateful to all men else. Considering in what age, and in what language I write, I must be fain to say, that these are not dreams: Though some English-men perhaps that were unacquainted with History, lighting upon this leaf, might suppose this discourse to be but little better. This is to shew, both how Tyranny grows to stand in need of mercenary Souldiers, and how those mercenaries are, by mutual obligation, firmly affixed unto the Tyrant.

† II.

That the Tyranny of a City over her Subjects is worse than the Tyranny of one man: And that a Tyrannical City must likewise use mercenary Souldiers.

NOW concerning the Tyranny wherewith a City or State oppresseth her Subjects; it may appear some ways to be more moderate, than that of one man: But in many things it is more intolerable. A City is jealous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearful of her life: The less need hath she therefore to secure herself by cruelty. A City is not luxurious in confining her treasures, and therefore needs the less to pluck from her Subjects. If War, or any other great occasion drive her to necessity of taking from her Subjects more than ordinary sums of money; the same necessity makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeed no wrongs are so grievous and harmful, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperour, to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may do what I list, and to whom I list: These words were accounted horrible; though he did her no harm. And Juvencius adds on it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruel Roman Dame upon her Slaves, that whilst she was whipping them, she painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and used all signs of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grievance wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all sense of indignity; likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although desire of liberty make them weary of her Empire. In these respects it is not needful that she should keep a Guard of licentious cutthroats, and maintain them in all villany, as a Discepolus or Agathocles must do: her own Citizens are able to terrify and to hold perforce in obedience, all male contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serve to prove, that a City is scarce able to deserve the name of a Tyranny, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appear, that the miseries wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people are not so heavy, as the burdens imposed by a cruel City. Not without some appearance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, we shall have need to use the help of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lascivious, when Cato was fain to rise and leave the Theater, to the end, that the reverend regard of his gravity might not hinder the people from calling for a few naked Courtesians, that were to be brought upon the open stage? By common practice, and general approved custom, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the private virtue or vice of any one man, nor by metaphysical abstraction of the universall from the singular; or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded: I say therefore (as I have said elsewhere) that it were better to live under one pernicious Tyrant, than under many Thoufands. The reasons proving this, are are too many to set down, but a few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soever, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and footed; age or good advice, yea, or some unexpected accident may reform him: All which failing, yet there is hope, that his successfull may prove better.

Many Tyrants have been changed into worthy Kings: And many have ill used their ill-gotten Dominion, which, becoming hereditary to their posterity, hath grown into the most excellent form of Government, even a lawful Monarchy. But they that live under a Tyrannical City, have no such hope: Their Misfortunes is immortal, and will not slacken the reins, until they be pulled out of her hands, and her own mouth receive the bridle of a more mightier Charrioteer. This is woful: Yet their presents sufferings make them less mindful of the future. New fires, and hungry ones, fall upon the same fore, out of which others had already sucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poor kindred and friends, who mean not to return home empty of their hives, without a good lading of wax and honey. These fly into all quarters and are quickly acquainted with every mans wealth, or whatsoever else, in all the Province, is worthy to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his fears: Becoming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterful guests, in hope to win their friendships, were an endless labour (yet it must be undergone) and such as every one hath not means to go about: But were this affected, what availeth it? The love of our Governour is purchased with gifts: The Successor of this man, he is more loving than could be wished in respect of a fair Wife or Daughter; then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goes, who seeks the ruins of all that have been in ward with them. So the misery of this Tyranny are not simple, but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of civil War. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or, Of Recovery, against extorting-Magistrates: Yet we find, that it served not wholly to restrain their Provincial Governours; who presuming on the favour of their own Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Provinces, to work all these inhumanities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for fear of judgment. If the Subjects of Rome groaned under such oppressions, what must we think of those that were Vassals unto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthensome Tributes; they loved not to hear, that their Emperors were quite contrary: The Rapines newly devised by one Magistrate, served as presidents to instruct another; every man resolved to do the like, when it should fall to his turn; and he was held a notable Statesman, whose Robberies had been such, as might afford a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice are not extant: The Governour of Verres the Roman in Sicily, that is lively set out by Tully, may serve to inform us, what was the demeanour of these Punic Rulers, who stood in fear of no such condemnation, as Verres underwent. By prosecuting this discourse, I might infer a more general propolition; that a City cannot govern her subject Provinces so mildly as a King, But it is enough to have shewed, that the Tyranny of a City is far more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Surable to the cruelty of such Lords, is the hatred of their subjects: And again, favorable to the hatred of the subjects, is the jealousy of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in Wars abroad, the Carthaginians durst use the service of African Souldiers; in Africa it felt they had rather be beholden to others, and were farther feared. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punic War, shift his Mercenaries out of their own Countries; Or Afric in Hispania, Hispani in Africa, mercenarii ab domo finitum metus miles, veluti pignus obligans Hispania Acem; that the Africans might serve in Spain, the Spaniards in Africa, being each of them like to prove the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutual pledges. It is disputable, I confess, whether these African and Spanish hirelings could properly be termed Mercenaries: For they were subject unto Carthage, and carried into the field, not only by reward, but by duty. Yet feeling their duty was no better than enforced, and that it was not any love to the State, but meer desire of gain, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand upon propriety of a word, but hold them as Polibius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.

† III.

The dangers growing from the use of mercenary Souldiers, and forraign Auxiliaries.

THE extreme danger, growing from the employment of such Souldiers, is well observed by Machiavel: Who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serve, than to those against whom they serve. They are feditious, unfaithful, disobedient, devoursers, and destroyers of all places and Countries, whereto they are drawn; as being held by no other bond, than their own commodity. Yea, that which is most fearful among such hirelings, is, that they have often, and in time of greatest extremity, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who have entertained them, but revolted unto the contrary party; to the utter ruin of those Princes and States that have trusted them. Those mercenaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italy when Charles the Eighth of France, did pass the Alpes, were the cause that the Laid French King won the Realm of Naples with his Buckler without a Sword. Notable was the example of Sforza the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Milan; who being entertained by Queen Jean of Naples, abandoned her service on the sudden, and forced her to put her self into the hands of the King of Aragon. Like unto his Father Francis Sforza, the first of that Race, Duke of Milan; who being entertained by the Milanese, forced them to become his slaves, even with the very same Army which themselves had levied for their own defence. But Lodowick Sforza, the Son of this Francis, by the just judgment of God, was made a memorable example, unto posterity, in losing his whole estate by the treachery of such faithless Mercenaries, as his own Father had been. For having waged an Army of Switzers, and committed his Duchy, together with his person, into their hands, he was by them delivered up unto his enemy the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches unto his dying day.

The like inconvenience is found, in using the help of forrain Auxiliaries. We see, that when the Emperour of Constantinople had hired ten Thousand Turks against his neighbour Princes, he could never, either by persuasion or force, let them again over the Sea upon Asia side; which gave beginning to the Christian servitude, that soon after followed. Alexander the Son of Cassander, fought aid of the great Demetrius: But Demetrius, being entered into his Kingdom, flew the same Alexander, who had invited him, and made himself King of Macedon. Syriacus the Turk, was called into Egypt, by Sapor Soldan, against his opposit: But the Turk did settle himself so surely in Egypt, that Saladin his Successor became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soon after. What need we look about for examples of this kind? Every Kingdom, in effect, can furnish us. The Britains drew the Saxons into this our Country; and Mae Murrough drew the English into Ireland; but the one and the other soon became Lords of those two Kingdoms.

Against all this, may be alleged the good success of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, using none other than such kind of Soldiers, in their late War. Indeed these Low-Countries have many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthy, industrious, and valiant in their kind. They are stout Sea-men, and therein is their excellency; neither are they bad at the defence of a place well fortified. But in open field they have seldom been able to stand against the Spaniards. Necessity therefore compelled them to seek help abroad: And the like necessity made them forbear to arm any great numbers of their own. For, with money raised by their Trade, they maintained the War: And therefore could ill spare unto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more use in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? They fared well. Surely they fared as ill as might be, whilst they had none other than mercenary Soldiers. Many fruitless attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witness it: And that brave Commander Count Lodowick of Nassau, left, to his grief, in his retreat from Groninghem; when, in the very instance that required their service in fight, his Mercenaries cried out aloud for money, and so ran away. This was not the only time, when the hired Soldiers of the States, have either sought to hide their cowardize under a show of greediness; or at least, by near covetousness, have ruined in one hour, the labour of many months. I will not stand to prove this by many examples: For they themselves will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monsieur the Duke of Arjois, brother to the French King; save that it is folly to conceal what all the World knows. He that would lay open the danger of forrain Auxiliaries, needeth no better pattern. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords over those, to whom they lend their favour. But where shall we meet with such another as this Monsieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Country, made it his first work, to thrust by violence a galling yoke upon the people neck? Well, he lived to repent it, with grief enough. Even whilst he was counterfeiting unto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginary sorrow for the poor Burghers of Antwerp, as verily believing the Town to be surprised and won; the death of the Count St. Sigismund, who fell over the wall, and the Cannon of the City, discharged against his own Troops, informed him better what had hapned; shewing, that they were his own French who stood in need of the pity. Then was his feigned passion changed into a very bitter anguish of mind, wherein, smiting his breast, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Hélas, mon dieu; que venez tu faire de moy? Alas, my God, what wilt thou do with me? So, the affairs of the Netherlands will not serve to prove, that there is little danger in using Mercenary Soldiers, or the help of forrain Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding, they were obedient unto necessity, and sought help of the English, Scots, and French: Wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King, pertraker with them in the same danger; when the Queen of England refused to accept the Sovereignty of their Country, which they offered, yet being provoked by the Spaniard their enemy, pursued him with continual War; when the heir of England reigned in Scotland, a King too just and wife (though not engaged in any quarrel) either to make profit of his neighbours miseries, or to help those that had attempted the Conquest of his own Inheritance: Then might the Netherlands very safely repose confidence in the forces of these three Neighbour Countries. The Soldiers that came unto them from hence, were to omit any other commendations (I nor only regardless of the pay that they should receive, but well affected unto the cause that they took in hand: Or, if any were cold in his devotion unto the side whereon he fought, yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his own home, where the English would have rewarded him with death, if that his faith had been corrupted by the Spaniards. They were therefore trilled with the Custody of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessity of the poorer sort was relieved, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the ability of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintain against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at the least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Country of the same Religion, and to which they all are lovingly affected: Then may such a Country be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other business, in hope of like success. But these circumstances meet so seldom, as it may well hold true in general: That mercenary and forrain Auxiliary Forces are no less dangerous, than the enemy against whom they are entertained.

† IV.

That the moderate government of the Romans, gave them assurance to use the service of their own Subjects in their Wars. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding Tyranny, which hindereth the use and benefit of the like moderation.

HERE it may be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to use the service of other Soldiers in their many great Wars, but performed all by their own Citizens? For if it were their manner to arm their own Subjects, how hapned it, that they feared no rebellion? If strangers, how then could they avoid the inconveniences above rehearsed? The answer is, that their Armies were compounded usually of their own Citizens; and of the Latines in equal number: To which they added, as occasion required, some companies of Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their Subjects, as were either interred in the quarrel, or might best be trusted. They had about these times (though seldom they did employ so many) ten Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other help had been wanting, which served to keep in good order their Subjects, that were always fewer in the Army than themselves. As for the Latines, if confluency were not a sufficient obligation; yet many privileges and immunities, which they enjoyed, made them assured unto the State of Rome: Under which they lived almost at liberty, as being bound to little else, than to serve it in War. It is true, that a yoke how easie soever, seems troublesome to the neck that hath been accustomed to freedom. Therefore many people of Italy have taken occasion of several advantages, to deliver themselves from the Roman subjection. But still they have been reclaimed by War, the Authors of rebellion have sharply been punished, and the people by degrees have obtained such liberty, as made them esteem none otherwise of Rome, than as the common City of all Italy. Yea, in process of time it was granted unto many Cities, and those far off removed, even to Tarvis in Cilicia, where St. Paul was born, that all the Burgeses should be free of Rome it self. This favour was conferred absolutely upon some, with restraint of giving notice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great Conquest, to release unto their new Subjects half of their Tribute which they had been wont to pay to their former Lords; which was a ready way to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the review of harder times past, should rather teach them to fear a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking innovation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a special note of the Romans good Government, that when some, for their well-deserving, have had the offer to be made Citizens at Rome, they have refused it, and held themselves better contented with their own present estate. Wherefore it is no marvel, that Petelia, a City of the Britains in Italy, chose rather to endure all extremity of War, than, upon any condition, to forsake the Romans; even when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were unable to help their Subjects, and therefore willed them to look to their own good, as having been faithful to the utmost. Such love perchance these mild Governours, without impairing their Majesty thereby. The sum of all is; they had, of their own, a strong Army; they doubled it by adjoining thereto the Latines; and they further increased it, as need required, with other help of their own Subjects: All, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperity of Rome to be the common good.

The moderate use of sovereign power being so effectual, in assuring the people unto their Lords, and consequently in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion: It may seem strange, that the practice of Tyranny, whose effects are contrary, hath been so common in all ages. The like, I know, may be said of all Vice and Irregularity, whatsoever. For it is less difficult (whosoever thinks otherwise) and more safe, to keep the way of Justice and Honesty, than to turn aside from it; yea commonly our passions do lead us into by-paths. But where Lust, Anger, Fear, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same unruly appetite, either bringeth with it an excuse, or, at least, will, take away all cause of wonder. In Tyranny it is not so: For as much as we can hardly defray the passion, that is of force to influence it self into the whole tenour of a Government: It must be confessed, that lawless desires have bred many Tyrants: Yet so that these desires have seldom been hereditary, or long-lasting, but have ended commonly with the Tyrants life, sometimes before his death; by which means the government hath been reduced to a better form. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holds, That Tyrannies are of a short continuance. But this doth not satisfy the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise Tyranny? Why did the Athenians? Why have many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their general good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safety of the Weal publick? If they were led hereto by any affection; what was that affection wherein to many Thousand Citizens, divided and subdivided within themselves by factions, did all concur, notwithstanding the much diversity of temper, and the vehemency of private hatred among them? Doubtless, we must be fain to say, that Tyranny is, by it self, a vice distinct from others. A man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt even by Nature, to command or to obey; every one in his proper degree, other degrees of Mankind, are common likewise unto brute Beasts; and some of them, to Bodies wanting sense: But the desire of rule belongeth unto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptness to yield obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are given by nature not only to Man and Beast, but unto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: As Fear, Anger, Lust, and other affections are likewise natural, in convenient measure, both unto Mankind, and to all Creatures that have sense, for the shunning or repelling of harm, and seeking after that which is requisite: Even so is this desire of ruling or obeying, ingrafted by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man only as a reasonable Creature, for the ordering of his life, in a civil form of Justice. All these in-bred qualities are good and useful. Nevertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttony and Drunkenness, which, in reproach, are called beastly, by an improper term: Since they grow from appetites, found in less worthy Creatures than Beasts, and are yet not so common in Beasts, as in Men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as descend no lower than unto brute Beasts, are held less vile; and perhaps not without good reason: Yet are the more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse by sharp Laws, as being in general more horrible, and punished for grievously, than of that which is best; there is not any passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtful unto Mankind, than that which issueth from the most noble root, even the depraved Affection of Ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefs, of which hath been an old question in dispute, whether be the worse; that all things, or that nothing should be lawful. Of these a dull Spirit and overladen by fortune with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary dilemma, whose vehemency the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Under the extremity of either, no Country is able to subsist, yet the defective dulness, that permitteth any thing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which much necessity doth enforce the ordinary Magistrate; whereas Tyranny is more active and pleads it self in the excess, with a false colour of Justice. Examples of stupidity, and unaptness to rule, are not very frequent;

quent, though such Natures are every where to be found: For this quality troubles not it self in seeking Empire; or it by some error of fortune, it encounter therewithal (as when Clodius, hiding himself in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend, or else a Wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also, cruelly doth help to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing unknown, is without a name. Tyranny is more bold, and feareth not to be known, but would be reputed honourable: For it is proferum & felix felus, a fortunate mischief, as long as it can subsist. There is no reward or honour (saith Peter Charvon) assigned unto those, that know how to increase, or preserve humane Nature: All Honours, Greatness, Riches, Dignities, Empires, Triumphs, Trophies, are appointed for those, that know how to assist, trouble, or destroy it. Cæsar and Alexander, have unmade and slain, each of them, more than a Million of men: But they made none, nor left none behind them. Such is the error of Mans judgment in valuing things according to the common opinion. But the true Name of Tyranny, when it grows to ripeness, is none other than Feritie. The fame that Aristotle faid to be worse than any Vice. It exceedeth indeed all other Vices, issuing from the passions incident both to Man and Beast; no less, than Perjury, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceed in villany, the faults of Gluttony and Drunkenness, that grow from more ignoble Appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Pnycomperes, that used their bodily force to the destruction of Mankind, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionysius, and Agathocles, whose mischievous heads were afflicted by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of Reason: Neither of them knew the use of Rule, nor the difference between Freeman and Slaves.

The Rule of the Husband over the Wife, and of Parents over their Children, is Natural, and appointed by God himself; so that it is always, and simply, allowable and good. The former of these, is as the dominion of Reason over Appetite; the latter is the whole Authority, which one Prince can have over another. The Rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father over his whole Country: Which he that knows what the Power of a Father is, or ought to be, knows to be enough. But there is a greater and more Masterly rule, which God gave unto Adam, when he said; Have dominion over the Fish of the Sea, and over the Fowl of the Air, and every living thing that moveth upon the Earth: Which also he continued unto Noah and his Children, saying, The fear of you, and the dread of you, shall be upon every Beast of the Earth, and upon every Fowl of the Air, upon all that moveth upon the Earth, and upon all the Fishes of the Sea: Into your hands are they delivered. He who gave this dominion unto Man, did give also an aptitude to use it. The execution of this power hath since extended it self, over a very great part of Mankind. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disability to govern themselves, proves them, according to Aristoteles Doctrine, to be naturally Slaves.

Yet find I not in Scripture any warrant to oppress men with bondage: unless the lawfulness thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, Thou shalt not be punished for the death of a servant; whom he hath slain by correction, if the servant live a day or two, because he is his Master's

Or else by the Captivity of the Midianites; Girls, which were made Bond-slaves, and the Sanctuary part of them for the Lords Tribute. Doubtless the custom hath been very ancient: For Noah laid this Curse upon Canaan, that he should be a Servant of Servants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, Men-servants and Maid-servants, which were none other than Slaves. Christian Religion is said to have abrogated this old kind of servility: But surely they are deceived that think so. Saint Paul delivered the liberty of Onesimus, whom he had won unto Christ: Yet wrote for this unto Philemon by way of request, craving it as a benefit, not urging it as a duty. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giveth unto Servants: Let ever man abide in the same calling wherein he was called: Art thou called, being a Servant? Care not for it, if by thou mayst be made free, use it rather. It is true, that Christian Religion hath procured liberty unto many; not only in regard of piety, but for that the Christian Masters stood in fear of being discovered by their Slaves, unto the persecutors of Religion. Mahomet likewise, by giving liberty to his followers, drew many unto his impiety: But whether he forbade it, as unlawful, unto his Sectators, to hold one another of them in Bondage, I cannot tell; save that by the practice of the Turks and *Moor*s, it seems he did not. In England we had many Bond-servants, untill the time of our last civil Wars; and I think that the Laws concerning Villenage are still in force, of which the late is the sharpest. And now, since Slaves were made free, which were of great use and service, they are grown up a rabble of Rogues, Cut-purses, and other the like Trades; Slaves in Nature, though not in Law.

But whether this kind of dominion be lawful, or not; Aristotle hath well proved, that it is Natural. And certainly, we find not such a Latitude of difference in any Creature, as in the Nature of man; wherein (to omit the infinite distance in estate of the Elect and Reprobate) the wisest excel the most foolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpass the wisest of Beasts. Therefore when Commiseration hath given way to reason, we shall find, that Nature is the ground even of Masterly power, and of servile obedience, which is thereto correspondent. But it may be truly said, that some Countries have substituted law without the use of any servility; as also it is true, that some Countries have not the use of any tame Cattle. Indeed the affections which uphold civil Rule, are (though more noble) not so simply needful, unto the sustentation either of our kind, as are Lust, and the like; or of every one, as are Hunger and Thirst; which notwithstanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile and servile dispositions have liberty to shew themselves begging in the Streets, there may we more justly wonder, how the dangerous toil of Seafaring men can find enough to undertake them, than how the swarm of idle Vagabonds should increase, by access of those that are weary of their own more painful condition. This may suffice to prove, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted even by Nature, a desire of absolute dominion: Whereunto the general custom of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in flatterers, that are the basest of Slaves.

This being so, we find no cause to marvel, how Tyranny hath been so rife in all Ages, and practised, not only in the fingle rule of some vicious Prince

Prince, but ever by consent of whole Cities and Estates: since other Vices have likewise gotten head, and born a general sway, notwithstanding that the way of Vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that have used well the inferior Passions: How then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not be disordered? In the Government of Wife and Children, some are utterly careless, and controul all by their dull connivency; others, by masterly rigour, hold their own blood under condition of slavery. To be a good Governour is a rare commendation: And to prefer the Weal publick above all respects whatsoever, is the Vertue justly termed Herical. Of this Vertue many Ages afford not many examples. Hætor is named by Aristotle as one of them; and deservedly, if this praise be due to extraordinary height of fortitude, used in defence of a mans own Country. But if we consider, that a love of the general good cannot be perfect, without reference unto the fountain of all goodness: I shall find, that no such Vertue, how great soever, can by it self, deserve the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Herical doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures for patterns hereof; such as David, Josaphat, and Jehoi were. Of Christian Kings, if there were many such, the World would soon be happy. It is not my purpose wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due, or by preferring a less excellent. But he that can find a King Religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement, either of adversity, or of some regard of State; a procurer of general Peace and quiet; who not only with his Authority, but adds the travel of his Eloquence, in admonishing his Judges to do justice; but the vigorous influence of whole Government, civility is infused, even into those places, that have been the Dens of savage Robbers and Cut-throats; one that hath quite abolished slavish Breton Law, by which a whole Nation of his subjects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue and wisdom doth make the praise not only of Nobility and other Ornaments, but of abstinence from the blood, the Wives, and the goods of those that are under his power, together with a world of chief commendations belonging unto some good Princes, to appear less regardable: He, I say, that can find such a King, finde an example, worthy to add unto Vertue an honourable Title, if it were formerly wanting. Under such a King, it is likely, by Gods blessing, that a Land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in Countries before unknown; that Civility and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen Countries; and that the happiness of his Subjects, shall cause the Nations far off removed, to wish him their Sovereign. I need not add hereunto, that all the actions of such a King, even his bodily exercises, do partake of Vertue; since all things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who fixing his contemplation upon God, seeketh how to imitate the unfeignable goodness, rather than the inaccessible Majesty, with both of which himself is indeed, as far as humane Nature is capable) do also bring to the furtherance of that common good, which he procurereth. Let any man should think me transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bounds of reason; I add hereunto, that such a King is nevertheless a map, must dye, and may err: Yet widom and fame shall set him free, from error, and from death, both with and without the help of time. One thing I may not omit, as a singular benefit (though there be many other besides redounding unto this King, as the fruit of his goodness) The People that live under a pleasant Yoke, are not not only loving to their Sovereign Lord, but free of courage; and no greater in Muller of men, than of stout fighters, if need require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as over Slaves, shall be attended in time of necessity, by slavish minds, neither loving his person, nor regarding his or their own honour. Rewards may be furious, and Slaves outrageous, for a time: But among Spirits that have once yielded unto slavery, universally it is found true, what Homer saith, God bereaveth a man of his vertue, that day when he casteth him into bondage.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonably have spoken, in general discourse of Government: but where so lively an example of the calamity following a tyrannical rule, and the use of Mercenaries, thereupon depending, did offer it self, as this present business of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectual, than being barely delivered, as out of a common place.

SECT. III.

How the War against the Mercenaries was diversly managed by Hanno and Amilcar, with variable success. The bloody councils of the Mercenaries, and their final destruction.

Being now to return unto those Mercenaries, from whom I have thus far digressed, I cannot readily find, by what name beneficent I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians, neither care they to pretend, that they seek their wages already due, so that they are neither Mercenaries, nor Muiniers. Had they all been Subjects unto Carthage, then might they justly have been termed Rebels: But Spandius, and others, that were the principal part of them, sought none allegiance to that State, which they endeavoured to subvert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercenaries, as Polybius also doth.

These, using the advantage of their present strength, Belieged * Utica and Hippagæra, Cities of great importance, as being placed upon the Western Haven of Carthage, where it is divided by a neck of Land; Hippagæra landing towards upon the great Lake, Utica further out unto the Sea, far within the Camp at Tunis abandoned, which lay fitly to hinder the Carthaginians from passing up into the Country: For Maius and Spandius wanting too men to follow the War in all parts at once, time it is called Porto Ferris, or Asitæ, and by the Africans themselves, Græci Asitæ. These faith, that the Town is still named, and the place whereon it stood, now called Asitæ. It was very ancient, and built before Carthage, faith Silius. As it flourished before Carthage was set up, so did it after Carthage was thrown down by the Romans in the third Punic War. Famous it was by the death of Cato the younger, who held it against Cæsar, Pisator that worthy Divine, was Bishop thereof in the time of Geoffrey the Arrian, who lived all the time of that Tyranny, and hath written the story of his cruelties.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this unexpected perill, any man may conceive. But the business it self awakes them hastily. They are hardly prest on all sides, and therefore travelled their brains the uttermost; how to shake off these furious Dogs from their shoulders, who sometimes by Night, sometimes by Day, came unto the very Walls of their City. In this exigent, Hanno was made their General: Who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good preparation; as ing all offences past, and dismissing as many as But had gotten together whatsoever was needful, as well to relieve a Town besieged, as to batter and assault any place defended against him. With these Provisions, and with a Hundred Elephants, he came to Utica, so suddenly, that the Enemies as men surprised, forsook their Trenches, and retired themselves unto a rising piece of Woody ground, where they might be safe against the violence of his Beasts. Hanno, thinking that he had to do with the Numidians, whose custom was after any loss, to flee two or three whole days journey off; presently entered the Town; to show himself after this Victory. But these good fellows, against whom he was to War, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight again, many times in one day, as need required. Therefore as soon as they perceived, that he knew not how to use a Victory; they assailed their own Camp, and with great slaughter, drove the Carthaginians out of it, forced them to hide themselves within Utica; and got possession of all the store that Hanno had brought for the relief of the Town. This had beginning Hanno followed with futable indifference; losing the benefit of many fair opportunities, and suffering the Enemies to take possession of all the entrance from Carthage to the firm Land.

The Carthaginians perceiving this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their Shere-Anchor; sending to the Field their great Captain Amilcar, whom they furnished with ten Thousand foot of supply, and Seventy Elephants. Amilcar had work enough to do, before he should be able to meet with the Enemy upon equal grounds. For, besides other places of advantage, thus the Mercenaries had occupied. Hanno had suffered them to win the only Bridge, by which the River Mero, or Bagradas, was passable unto these, that were to travel into the Continent. This River had not many Fords, nor those easy for a single man to get over: But upon them all was kept such Guard, as gave to Amilcar little hope of prevailing in seeking way by force. As for the Bridge it self, Maho and his followers were there lodged: And had there built a Town, wherein to lye commodiously, intensive only the custody thereof. But Amilcar had observed, that the very mouth of Bagradas used to be sometimes cloyed with Sand and Gravel, that was driven in by certain customary Winds, and could not be driven out again, by force of that slow River, till the Wind falling or changing, suffered the weight of the Waters, to disturb their channel. Hereof he made use; and taking his opportunity passed the River, contrary to all expectation, either of the Enemy, or of his own Citizens.

There was no need to bid Spentius look about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come over Bagradas: All the Mercenaries were troubled with the news; knowing that they were no longer to deal with the imprudent gravity of Hanno, but with an able Spirit, even with their own Master in the Art of War, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this fear was soon changed into presumption; when more than Fifteen Thousand of their own Society, were come from Utica, and other Ten Thousand from the Guard of the Bridge, their Army was far greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were in their own judgment, the better men; upon which confidence, they resolved to charge him on all sides, and beat him down, in despite of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attend upon him, watching for some advantage; and still exhorting one another to play the men, and give the onset. Especially they that followed him in the Rear, had a great mind to begin the fight; whereunto their promptness was such, as took from them their former circumspection. Amilcar held his way toward the Bridge, keeping himself on plain grounds, that were fittest for the service of his Elephants, which he placed in Front of his Army. Neither made he show of any desire to fight, but suffered the rashness of his Enemies to encrease, till it should break into some disorder. At length perceiving, that with more boldness than good speed, they followed him so near, as would be little for their good, if he should turn unto them, he halted his march, even to such a pace, as made a few little differences from plain flight. The Mercenaries presently fell upon his skirts; believing, that for fear of them he was ready to run away. But whilst they confidently, as in sudden opinion of victory, were driven at the heels of those that had the Rear; Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order; so that amazed, with the apprehension of un-expected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this overthrow there were Six Thousand of the Mercenaries slain, and about Two Thousand taken, the rest fled, some to the Camp at Utica, others to the Town at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them to fast, that he wan the place easily; the Enemies being thence also fled unto Tunis, as not having recollected their Spirits to make it good.

The fame of this Victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in pursuing it, caused many Towns revolted, partly by fear, partly by force, to return to their former obedience. Yet was not Maho wanting to himself in this dangerous time. He sent about Namidia and Africk, for new supplies, admonishing the People, now or never, to do their best, for the recovery of their freedom: He persuaded Spentius, and Antarius, that was a Captain of the Gauls, to wait upon Amilcar, and always to keep the higher grounds, or at least, the foot of some Hill, where they might be free from the Elephants, and he himself continued to press the Town of Hippagrea with an hard Siege. It was necessary for Amilcar, in passing from place to place; as his business required, to take such ways as there were: For all the Country lay not level. Therefore Spentius, who still coasted him, had once gotten a notable advantage of ground; the Carthaginians lying in a plain, surrounded with Hills, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their Numidian and African succours. In this difficulty, the fame of Amilcar his personal worth did greatly benefit his Country. For Naravastus, a young Gentleman commanding over the Numidians, was glad of this occasion, serving to get the acquaintance and love of so brave a man, which he much desired: And therefore came unto Amilcar signifying his good affection to him, with offer to do him all service. Amilcar joyfully entertained this friend, promised unto him his own Daughter in Marriage; and so wan from the Enemies 2000 Horse, that following Naravastus returned unto the Carthaginian side. With this help he gave Battel unto Spentius; wherein the Numidian laboured to approve his own valour to his new friend. So the Victory was great: For there were slain Ten Thousand of Spentius his fellows, and Four Thousand taken Prisoners; but Spentius himself, with Antarius the Gaul, escaped to do more mischief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his Prisoners; Pardonwere unwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they should never more bear Arms against the Carthaginians; threatening to take sharp revenge upon all that should break this Covenant.

This humanity was vehemently suspected by Maho, Spentius, and Antarius, as attending to win from them the hearts of their Soldiers. Wherefore they resolved to take such order, that no man among them should dare to trull in the good Nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any safety whilst Carthage was able to do him hurt. The counterfeited Letters of advertisement, wherein was contained, that some of their company, respective only of their private benefit, and careless of the general good, had a purpose to betray them all to the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needful to look well unto Gefo, and his companions, whom these Traitors had a purpose to enlarge. Upon this Theme Spentius makes an Oration to the Soldiers, exhorting them to fidelity; and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanity of Amilcar toward some, was none other than a bait, wherewith to intrap them all at once together; as also telling them what a dangerous Enemy Gefo would prove, if he might escape their hands. Whilst he is yet in the midst of his tale, there letters come to the same purpose. Then steps forth Antarius, and speaks his mind plainly: Saying, that it were the best, yet the only way, for the common safety, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were desiring to make their own peace, it will go hard with those that had a care of the War; that it were better to make an end of Gefo's life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his custody; that by such a course every one should be engaged in the present Action, as having none other hope left, than in Victory alone; finally, that such as would speak here-against, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Antarius was in great credit with the Soldiers, and could speak sundry Languages, in such sort, that he was understood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Gefo, and all the other Prisoners, should forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Nevertheless there were some, that for love of Gefo sought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthwith stoned to death, as a Document unto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they there without contented, but further ordered, that all Carthaginian Prisoners which they took, should be served in like sort; and that the subjects or friends of Carthage, should lose their hands, and so be sent home, which rule they observed ever afterwards.

Of this cruelty I need say no more, than that it was most execrable ferocity. As for the counsel of using it, it was like unto the counsel of Achitophel; All Israel shall bear, that thou art abhorred of thy Father; then shall the hands of all that are with thee be strong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his own fellows, if they be more innocent; and to avoid the punishment of less offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the revengeful Spirits of those that have been wronged, are breeders of some deficiency of Laws, in distinguishing the punishments of Malefactors, according to the degree of their several crimes. A coward thinks all provision too little for his own security. If Phocas be a coward (said the Emperor Mauricius) then he is murderous. To be steadfast and true, in taking revenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defensative against new injuries. But wrongfully: for it is opposite to the rule of Christianity; and such a quality discovered, makes them deadly Enemies, who otherwise would have repented, and sought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it which wrought so much to do the Carthaginians; teaching Maho, and his Africans, to suspect even their gentleness, as the introduction to extreme rigour. Like unto the errors of Princes and Governors, are the errors of Laws. Where one and the same punishment is awarded unto the less offence, and unto the greater; he that hath adventured to rob a man is easily tempted to kill him for his own security.

A gainst these inconveniences, Mercy and Severity, used with due respect, are best remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as these his old Soldiers were any way likely to be reclaimed by gentle courses, his humanity was ready to invite them. But when they were transported with brautly outrage, beyond all regard of honesty and flame, he rewarded their villany with unanswerable vengeance, casting them unto wild Beasts to be devoured.

Until this time Hanno, with the Army under his command, had kept himself apart from Amilcar, and done little as my feat, for that nothing is remembered of him since his late losses. Neither was Amilcar sorry to want his help; as being able to do better without him. But when the War grew to such extremity, as threatened utter ruin to the one or the other side: Then was Hanno sent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he joynd his Forces. By this access of strength Amilcar was not enabled to do more than in former times; rather he could now perform nothing: Such was the hatred between him and his unworthy Colleague. The Towns of Utica and Hippagrea, that had stood always firm to the Carthaginian party, did now revolt unto the Enemy, murdering all the Soldiers that they had in Garrison, and calling their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The Provisions brought by Sea, for maintenance of the Army, were lost in foul weather, and Carthage it self stood in danger of being Belieged, about which Maho and Spentius consulted, whilst one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) bind the others hands.

It hath in all Ages been used as the safest course to send forth, in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Army. This was the common practice of those two mighty Cities Athens and Rome, which other States and Princes have often imitated; persuading themselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: Who out of emulation to excel each other, will use the greater diligence. They have also joynd two chief Commanders in equal commission, upon this further consideration; the better to restrain the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For hereof all Common-wealths have been jealous, having been taught by their examples that have made themselves Tyrants over those Cities and States that have employed them. In this point the Venitians have been so circumspect, as they have, for the most part, trusted strangers, and not their own in all the Wars which they have made. It is true, that the equal authority of Two commanding in chief, serveth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning upon the Prince or State that hath given them trust. But in managing the War it self, it is commonly the cause of ill success. In wars made near unto Rome it self, when two good friends were Consults, or such Two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph, which honour (the greater of any that

K k k k Ront

Rome could give) was to be obtained by that One Years service; it is no marvel, though each of the Consuls did his best, and inferred all his thoughts unto none other end than victory. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise than was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed the manner, to send forth both the Consuls to one War; but each went whither his lot called him, to his own Province; unless one business seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be joyed in the administration. Now although it was, that the Romans did many times prevail with their joynt Generals: Yet was this never so seldom, without as much concord, as any other virtue of the Commanders. For their modesty hath often been such, that the less able Captain, though of equal authority, hath willingly submitted himself to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they have many times by ordaining Two Commanders of one Army, received great and most dangerous overthrows, wherefore in the Second Punic War we shall find examples. On the contrary side, in their Wars most remote, that were always managed by one, they seldom failed to win exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appear. Now of those Ten Generals, which served the Athenians at the Battle of Marathon, it may be truly said, that had not their temper been better than the judgment of the People that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Miltiades; their affairs had found the same success which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicily: The one being so over-war, and the other too hasty, as all came to nought that they undertook. Whereas Cimon alone, as also Arifides, and others, having sole charge of all, did their Country and Commonwealth most remarkable service. For it is hard to Two great Captains of equal discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of fury than of judgment, and so the contrary, by which the best occasions are as often overslippt, as at other times many actions are unseasonably undertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Conde was slain after the Battle of Jarnac, (which Prince, together with the Admiral Chastillon, had the conduct of the Protestant Army) the Protestants did greatly bewail the loss of the said Prince in respect of his Religion, Person, and Birth; yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an advancement, than an hindrance to their affairs. For so much did the Valour of the one outreach the aduissness of the other, as whatsoever the Admiral intend to win by attaining the advantage, the Prince adventured to lose, by being over-confident in his own courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present business: Who, though they were full fill of their ill-grounded love to Hanno, and were unwilling to disgrace him; yet seeing that all ran towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their Controversies, unto the Army that served under them. The judgment of the Army was, that Hanno should depart the Camp: Which he did, and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar, and that was enough.

After this, the affairs of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho and Spandius had brought their Army near unto the City; and lay before it, as in a Siege. They might well be bold to hope and adventure much, having in their Camp above Fifty Thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Nevertheless, the City was too strong for them to win by assault: And the entrance of victuals they could not hinder, if any should be sent in by friends from abroad.

Hiero King of Syracuse, though during the Wars in Sicily he assisted the Romans, and still continued in their alliance, yet now felt succours to the Carthaginians: Fearing their fall, and consequently his own; because if no other State gave the Romans somewhat to trouble their digestion, the Principality of Syracuse would soon be devoured by them. The Romans also gave them some slender assistance, and, for the present, refused good offers made unto them by the Mercenaries; which they did to shew a noble kind of disposition; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the sequel manifestly proved.

Whilst Matho and his followers were busily pressing the City, Amilcar was as diligent in waiting at their backs, and cutting off all that came to their supply: So that finding themselves more fearfully Belieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desert from their vain attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issued into the Field: When Spandius, and one Zarastis, an African Captain assisting the Rebellion, take upon them to find Amilcar work; leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a general care of the business. The Elephants of Carthage, and Horse of Naravasus, made Spandius fearful to descend into the Plains. Wherefore he betook himself to his former method of War, keeping the Mountains, and rough grounds, or occupying the straightest passages wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it self, with little disadvantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spandius. He drew the Enemy to many skirmishes; in all which the success was such, as added courage to his own men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, provoking them Night and Day: Still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giving them the over-throw in plain Battle: until at length he got them into a straight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to make of them a good account. Their judgment was enough to perceive their own disadvantage; and therefore they had the less stomach to fight; but availing for help from Tunis, Amilcar prudently foreseeing, that necessity might teach them to dare impossibilities, used the benefit of their present fear, and thus they close up with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably, for succour that came not: And having spent all their Victuals, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed upon the bodies of their Prisoners. This they suffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deserved any favour from Carthage: And hoping that their friends at Tunis would not be unmindful of them. But when they were driven to such extremity that they were fain to devour their own companions, and yet saw none appearance or likelihood of relief: Their obstinacy was broken, and they threatened their Captains with what they desired: unless they would go forth to Amilcar, and seek such Peace as might be gotten. So Spandius, Zarastis, and Amirinus, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolved to obey the Multitude, and yield themselves, if it were so required, unto the death, rather than perish by the hands of their own companions. Hereupon they fend to crave Parly, which is granted; and these Three come forth to talk with Amilcar in person. What they could say unto him it is hard to conjecture: Yet by the condition which Amilcar granted, it seems that they took the blame upon themselves, and craved pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should chuse, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remain at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his third, or in one single Coat. When the peace was thus concluded, Amilcar told these Ring-leaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: The rest he forthwith went to fetch with his whole Army in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded upon so gentle Articles, thought themselves betrayed: And therefore amazedly ran to Arms. But they wanted Captains to order them; and the same astonishment that made them break the Covenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gave unto Amilcar both colour of Justice, in accomplishing revenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all Slain: Being forty Thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: And the news thereof exceeding welcome to Carthage, and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africa. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Naravasus, and Hannibal, carried the War from Town to Town, and found all places ready to yield: Utica and Hippagreta only standing out, upon fear of deferred vengeance; and Tunis, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Army. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chief strength of the enemy: Coming before this Town, they brought forth Spandius, with his fellows, in view of the defendants, and criticized them under the walls; to terrify those of his old companions, that were still in Arms. With this rigour the Siege began; as if speedy victory had been assured. Hannibal quiered on that part of Tunis, which lay toward Carthage. Amilcar on the opposite side: Too far sundred to help one another in sudden accidents: And therefore it behoved each to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the walls beheld his own destiny, in the misery of his companion, and knew not how to avoid it otherwise than by a cast at dice with fortune. So he brake out upon that part of the Carthaginian Army, that lay secure, as if all danger were past, under the command of Hannibal; and with too great and unexpected fury he sallied, that after an exceeding slaughter, he took Hannibal prisoner: On whom, and thirty the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, he presently revenged the death of Spandius, by the same Torture. Of this, Amilcar knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great loss, to continue the Siege; but was fain to break it up, and remove unto the mouth of the River Bagradas, where he incamped.

The terror was no less within Carthage, upon the fame of this loss, than had been the joy of the late great victory. All that could bear Arms, were sent into the Field, under Hanno: whom, it seems, they thought the most able of their Captains and leaders in the late accidents of War. If there were any Law among them forbidding the employment of one sole General near unto their City (for they are known to have trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hasty exigent, to devise about repealing it. But thirty principal men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcar's Camp, and by all good persuasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. Itself of Hannibal in his honour, that the carelessness of Hannibal seemed to be imposed unto him; by sending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Nevertheless, after many conferences, the authority of the Senators prevailed; and Amilcar and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilst this War lasted, Hanno took warning by Hannibal's calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the mean season Matho was come abroad, as meaning to use the reputation of his late success, whilst it gave some life unto his business. He had reason to do as he did: But he wanted skill to deal with Amilcar. The skirmishes, and light exercises of War, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did so far abate the strength, and whilst diminish the credit of Matho; that he resolved to try the fortune of one Battle: Wherein either his own desire should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no less prone, than Matho: as being weary of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their own men, which had approved itself in many trials; and well assured of Amilcar's great worth, whereunto the enemy hath reason to suppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making provision: Inviting their friends to help, and drawing forth into the Field, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this Battle might have been foretold; without help of witchcraft. Matho and his followers, had nothing whereon to presume, save their daring Spirits, which had been well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as having been often victorious: And in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely that the desire of liberty should work so much, in men accustomed to servitude; as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whose future and present good lay all at once engaged in that adventure. So the Carthaginians won a great Victory, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were slain; the rest fled into a Town, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yielded; and Matho himself was taken alive. Immediately upon this Victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to the old Masters: Utica only, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deserved of favour. But they were soon forced to take what conditions best pleased the Victors. Matho and his fellows were led to Carthage in triumph, where they suffered all Torments that could be devised, in recompence of the mischief which they had wrought in this War. The War had lasted three years, and about four months, when it came to this good end: Which the Carthaginians, whose Subjects did not love them, should wish less expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, have prevented in the beginning.

SECT. IV.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: And were afterwards driven out by the Islanders. The faithful dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

VHilt Matbo and Spendius were making terrible combustion in Africk, other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: Where murdering Bostar the Governour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Island to their own use. Against these, one Hanno was sent with a small Army (such as could be spared in that bulwark time) consulting likewise of Mercenaries, levied on the fudden. But these Companies that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, and present profit, to join themselves with those that were already revolted, than to endanger themselves by Battle, for the good of that Commonwealth, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinians Rebels, offering to run one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore to take away all jealousy and distrust, they resolved to hang up their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath been in all Ages, with those that have undertaken the quarrel of an unjust War, to enjoy the performance of some notorious and villainous act, to those that come into them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they have in hand. It is indeed the best pawn, that desperate men can deliver to each other, to perform some such actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By such a kind of cruelty did the ungrateful Martinians murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent unto them for their defence against the Lacedaemonians, by Aratus; who, when he had formerly possessed himself of their City, by right of War, did not only spare the sack and spoil thereof, but gave them equal freedom, with the rest of the Cities united. These revolts are also common in our Countreys; where, in the Conquest of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of old friends, we cannot be received and trusted by old enemies. Cyrom the compe villosa of Aratus. These (say the French) be the blows of the old Art of fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit less violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his associates: Only they wanted Matbo among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Province. The Islanders were no less glad, than the Souldiers, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Country: But they could not agree about the profit of the victory. The Sardinians thought it was enough, if they rewarded the Souldiers for their pains taken. Contrariwise, the Souldiers were of opinion, that the debt the Carthaginians owed to them, was devoted unto themselves, by right of Conquest. The same quarrel would (in likelihood) have risen between Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends; if the common desire of both had once taken effect: Unless the riches of Carthage had served to content them all.

But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Country; the matter was not easily taken up. So they fell to blows; which how they were dealt, I know not; but finally the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to save themselves in Italy. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had invited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicily. Yet this offer was refused, upon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieved Matbo and Spendius with Corn: Of whom the Carthaginians took almost five Hundred, and held them in Prison. Hereof was made a great complaint: So that the Romans sent Embassadors to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: They quietly yielded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all provisions to Carthage. And upon the same reason did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept of the City of Onica, offering it self unto their subjection. This might have served as a notable example of the Romans Faith, to all posterity: Had not the ill use proved, that it was made regard of greater profit, which kept them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriving better thereby, than they should have done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended at that time, upon the virtue of Amilcar: Who had been overthrown by Spendius or Matbo, in one main Battle; that mighty City must either have fallen into the barbarous hands of merciless Villains, or have humbled her self under protection of the Romans, with whom she had lately striven for superiority. That extreme necessity, wherein Matbo reduced the City, by the fortune of one fall made out of Tunis, is enough to prove, that Carthage was not far from such a miserable choice. Wherefore it was not unprofitably done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindness, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich, but sinking Ship, to run her self aground upon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africk, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia, then did Amilcar put off her goodly vizard. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feet again; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denominated War against this enfeebled and impoverished City, under a shameful pretence, that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeed against Rome it self. The Carthaginians knew themselves unable to resist, and therefore yielded to the Romans demand; renouncing unto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have twelve Hundred Talents, in recompence belike (for I see not what reason they could allege) of the great fear which they had endured, of an invasion from Carthage. It is indeed plain, that they impudently sought occasion of War. But necessity taught the Romans patience; and the money was paid, how hardly soever it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complain of the Tunis's faith, in breach of Covenants: She her self hath broken the peace already; which Amilcar put off to make her debt repay; but what Amilcar lives not to perform, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned Son.

SECT.

SECT. V.

How the affairs of Carthage went, between the African Rebellion, and the second Punick War.

THE injurious dealings of the Romans, expressing their desire to pick a quarrel; served to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessary lesson; that either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolve to be obedient unto those that were more mighty. In a City long accustomed to rule, the braver determination easily took place: And the best means were thought upon, for the increase of Power and Empire. The strength, and the jealousy of the Romans, forbade all attempts upon the Mediterranean Sea; but the riches of Spain, that lay upon the Ocean, were unknown to Rome: Therefore that Province might serve both to exercise the Carthaginians in War, and to repair their decayed forces, with all needful supplies. Of the Spanish Expedition, the charge and sovereign trust was committed unto Amilcar: Upon whom his Country did wholly repose it self; in hope to recover strength by his means, that had saved it from ruin.

Hanno, with some other envious men that were of his faction, took little pleasure in the general love and honour, which daily inclined towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not deny the him to be the most worthy of command in all the City: Only they commended peace and quietness; advising men to beware of provoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the ears of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Commonwealth, they got none other reputation, than of singularity: Which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisdom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually upheld and enlarged, by many notable services that he did, to the singular benefit of his Country. He passed the Straights of Hercules (now called the Straights of Gibraltar) and landed on the Western Coast of Spain; in which Country, during nine years that he lived there, he subjected unto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally in a Battle that he fought with a Nation in Portugal, called the Vestones (defending himself a long time with an admirable resolution) he was invironed and slain: Carrying with him to the grave the fame great honour and fame, by which in many signal Victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his Son-in-law was made General of the Carthaginian Forces in Spain. This was a good man of War, but far better in practice and cunning than in deeds of arms. By his notable dexterity in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: Adding to many subjects and confederates, whereunto, that the Romans began to grow jealous again of this hasty increase. He built a goodly City upon a commodious Haven, in the Kingdom of Granada, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gave it the name of New Carthage, which in this day it nearly retaineth, being called now Carthagena. With this success of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled; but began to accuse their own negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much pains to beat them out of the Isle of Sicily, as suspecting the wealth of their neighborhood there; they had now, by committing themselves in a War of far less importance, picked by whom (whereof I shall speak anon) given them leisure without interruption, to recover upon their own Continent, a Dominion by far exceeding both in the year 1282, was the Bodies of men, and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But now to help them in this, at the present they know not; for they daily in the expected to be invaded by the Gauls, their ancient enemies, and nearest neighbours to the West. But he needed little help of force, that knoweth himself to be feared: It is enough if he request, since his request, shall have the virtue of a command.

Yet were the Romans utterly destitute of all good colour, that might help them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then unacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: So that there were no Mamertines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours; but in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serve their turn in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affairs had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose to extend his Victories unto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: Yet (as if some such matter had been suspected) they sent unto him, requiring that he should forbear to proceed any further, than to the River of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the City of Carthage; they seem to have hoped, that the howsoever the generality of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pills, to avoid all occasion of War with Rome, yet the bravery of one man might prove more fastidious, and resenting the injury, return such answer, as would intangle his whole Country in the quarrel, that they to much desired; and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: And whereas they would have this insolent covenant inferred into the Articles of peace; he took upon him to do it of his own power, with such appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and fought no further.

If it had been so, that the State of Carthage a thereto passed by the Romans, for fear of present War, had raised this new composition made by Asdrubal; yet should it not have stood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, unless an oath had also been extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, under the bare authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of perjury (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treaty with Asdrubal, the Romans were some reputation in Spain. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the City which would needs be Mistress over them, stood in fear her self of receiving blows from a flatterer Dame; there were soon found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-servants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly reach them another lesson. The Sagunines, a people on the South-side of Iberus, entered into confederacy with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawful unto the Romans to admit the Sagunines, or any other

The whole estate of Carthage depended at that time, upon the vertue of Amilcar: Who, had been overthrown by Spendius or Matbo, in one main Battle, that mighty City must either have fallen into the barbarous hands of merciless Villains, or have humbled her self under protection of the Romans; with whom she had lately striven for superiority. This extreme necessity, wherein Matbo reduced the City, by the fortune of one fallily made of Tunis, is enough to prove, that Carthage was not far from such a miserable choice. Wherefore it was not unwisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindness, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich, but sinking Ship, to run her self aground upon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africa, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia, then did Ambition put off her goodly vizor. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feet again; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denominated War against this emboldened and impoverished City, under a shameful pretence, that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeed against Rome it self. The Carthaginians knew themselves unable to resist, and therefore yielded to the Romans demand; renouncing unto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have twelve Hundred Talents, in recompence belike (for I fee not what reason they could allege) of the great fear which they had endured, of an invasion from Carthage. It is indeed plain, that they impudently sought occasion of War. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the money was payed, how hardly soever it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complain of the Punic faith, in breach of Covenants: She her self hath broken the peace already; which Amilcar purposeth to make her dearly repent; but what Amilcar lives not to perform, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned Son.

SECT.

SECT. V.

How the affairs of Carthage went, between the African Rebellion, and the second Punic War.

THE injurious dealings of the Romans, expressing their desire to pick a quarrel; led to intrust the Carthaginians in a necessary lesson; that either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolve to be obedient unto those that were more mighty. In a City long accustomed to rule, the braver determination easily took place: And the best means were thought upon, for the increase of Puissance and Empire. The strength, and the jealousy of the Romans, forbade all attempts upon the Mediterranean Sea; but the riches of Spain that lay upon the Ocean, were unknown to Rome: Therefore that Province might serve both to exercise the Carthaginians in War, and to repair their decayed forces, with all needful supplies. Of the Spanish Expedition, the charge and sovereignty was committed unto Amilcar: Upon whom his Country did wholly repose it self; in hope to recover strength by his means, that had saved it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other envious men that were of his faction, took little pleasure in the general love and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not deny him to be the most worthy of command in all the City: Only they commended peace and quietness; advising him to beware of provoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the ears of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weal, they got none other reputation, than of singularity: Which the ignorant folk suspected to be wisdom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually upheld and enlarged, by many notable services that he did, to the singular benefit of his Country. He peopled the straits of Hercules (now called the straits of Gibraltar) and landed on the Western Coasts of Spain; in which Country, during nine years that he lived there, he subjected unto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally in a Battle that he fought with a Nation in Portugal, called the Vettones (defending himself a long time with an admirable resolution) he was invironed and slain: Carrying with him to the grave the fame great honour and fame, by which in many signal Victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his Son-in-law was made General of the Carthaginian Forces in Spain. This was a good man of War; but far better in practice and cunning than in deeds of arms. By his notable dexterity in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: Adding to many Subjects and confederates thereto, that the Romans began to grow jealous again of this hasty increase. He built a goodly City upon a commodious Haven, in the Kingdom of Granada, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gave it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it nearly retaineth, being called now * Carthage. With this success of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled; but began to accuse their own negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much pains to beat them out of the Isle of Sicily, as suspecting their neighborhood there; they had now, by embarking themselves in a War of far less importance, (whereof I shall speak anon) given them leisure without interruption, to recover upon their own Continent, a Dominion by far exceeding both in the Bodies of men, and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But now to help in this, at the present they know not; for they daily expected to be invaded by the Gauls, their ancient enemies, and nearest neighbours to the West. But he needeth little help of force, that knoweth himself to be feared: It is enough if he request, since his request, shall have the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans utterly destitute of all good colour, that might help them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then unacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: So that there were no Matinians, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours; but in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serve their turn in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affairs had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose to extend his Victories unto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: Yet (as if some such matter had been suspected) they sent unto him, requiring that he should forbear to proceed any further, than to the River of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the City of Carthage; they seem to have hoped, that howsoever the generality of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pills, to avoid all occasion of War with Rome, yet the bravery of one man might prove more fastidious, and resenting the injury, return such answer, as would intangle his whole Country in the quarrel, that they lo much desired; and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: And whereas they would have this insolent command inferred into the Articles of peace; he took upon him to do it of his own power, with such appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their ways contented, and fought no further.

If it had been so, that the State of Carthage; thereunto passed by the Romans, for fear of present War, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal; yet should it not have stood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, unless an oath had also been extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, under the bare authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of perjury (as they affected) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treaty with Asdrubal, the Romans wanted some reputation in Spain. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the City which would needs be Masters over them, stood in fear her self of receiving blows from a flatterer Dame; there were found found, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-servants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South-side of Iberus, entered into confederacy with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawful unto the Romans to admit the Saguntines, or any other other people (neither subject, nor open enemy in War to the Carthaginians) into their society: And unlawful it was unto the Carthaginians, to use violence towards any that should thence become confederate with Rome. Nevertheless, if we consider the late agreement made with Afrubal, we shall find that the Romans could have none other honest colour of requiring it, than an implicit Covenant of making the River Iberus a bound, over which they themselves would not pass, in any Discovery or Conquest by them intended to be made upon Spain: In which regard, they might have some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome, as yet, had no foot on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage on the other side of that River, held almost all the Country. However it were, this indignity was not easily digested, as former injuries had been. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginians, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, upon confidence of help from a more mighty City. Wherefore either in this respect, or for that the sense is most feeling, of the latest injuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to do themselves right: War against Saguntum was generally thought upon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such terms were the Carthaginians, when Afrubal dyed, after he had commanded in Spain eight years (being slain by a Slave whose Master he had put to death) and the great Hannibal, Son of the great Anibcar, was chosen General in his stead.

SECT. VI.

The estate of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reign of Philip the Son of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long term of the first Punic War, and the vacation following, between it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was grown somewhat like unto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though far weaker, as the after-spring. The whole Country had recovered by degrees, a form of liberty: In petty Tyrannies (bred of those inferior Captains, which in the time of general combustion, had seized each upon such Towns as he could get) were, by force or accident, exsipated, and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatness, as not only served to defend themselves, but to give protection to others. This conversion to the better, proceeded from the like diffusions and tumults in Macedon, as had been in Greece, when Philip first began to encroach upon it. For after many quarrels and great Wars, about the Kingdom of Macedon, between Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gauls: Antigonus the Son of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning six and thirty years; yeto, that he divers times thence expelled, not only by the Gauls, and by Pyrrhus, as hath been already shewed, but by Alexander the Son of Pyrrhus the Epirus, from whose father he had hardly won it. This happened unto him, by the revolt of his Soldiers, even at such time, as having overthrown with great slaughter an Army of the Gauls, he was converting his Forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receive his Garrisons. But his young Son Demetrius raised an Army, wherewith he chased Alexander, not only out of Macedon, but out of his own Epirus, and restored his Father to the Kingdom.

By the help of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadel of Corinth, which was justly termed the fester of Greece. This Citadel called, Acrocorinthus, stood upon a steep Rocky Hill on the North Side of the Town, and was by Nature and Art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the Town, which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running between the Aegean and Ionique Seas, joyneth Peloponnesus to the Main of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle was able to cut off all passage by land, from one half of Greece unto the other: besides the commodity of the two Seas, upon both of which, this rich and goodly City had commodious Havens. Alexander, the Son of Polyperchon, and after his death, Crateipolis his Wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Provinces and Towns, that was made between Alexander Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, until it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I find no other else, than that he was thought to be poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his Wife Nicea thereof, and got it from her by a trick. The device was this: Antigonus sent his young Son Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicea, and seek her marriage. The foolish old widow perceived not how unfit a match this was for the young Prince, but entertained the fancy of marriage; whereto the old King was even as ready to consent, as was his Son to desire, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with Sacrifices, Feasts, Plays, and all sorts of Games: In the midst of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poor Lady, whose jealousy had been exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not contain himself within the gravity befitting his old age. But as he had stolen it; so was it again stolen from him: Neither lived he to revenge the loss of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius, the Son of this Antigonus, succeeding unto his Father, Reigned ten years. He made greater proof of his virtue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Acælians held him continually busied in War; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the most part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: And the Græcians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the only Son of Demetrius, was a young Child when his Father dyed; and therefore Antigonus, his Uncle, had the charge of the Kingdom, during the minority of the Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philip as his own Son, to whom he left the Crown at his death; this Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectors; and was also called Deion, that is as much as, Will-give, because he was slow in his liberality. He repressed the Dardanians and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdom, in the beginning of his Reign. Upon confidence of this good service, he took state upon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, than only a Protector. Hereupon the people felt to mutiny; but were soon appeased by fair words, and a seeming seeming unwillingness of his to meddle any more with the Government. The Achaïans took from him the City of Athens, soon after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to have wrought him out of all, or most that he held in Greece, if their own estate had not been endangered by a nearer enemy. But civil diffension, which had overthrown the power of Greece, when it flourished most, overthrew it easily now again, when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sickness, and gave to this Antigonus no less authority therein, than Philip the Father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

These Achaïans, from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: So that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equality of their Laws, and by their clemency (notwithstanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not only draw all others by their love and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to be governed by one Law, and to use one and the same sort of weights, measure, and money.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that united them again; and gave them courage, after that they had been by the Macedonian Captains divided into many Principalities. In elder times they were governed by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kind of rule they first subjected themselves, after the descent of the Heraclidae, when Tisamenus the Son of Orestes possessed the Territory of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Ogyges; after whom, when his Sons sought to change the Legal Government of their Predecessors unto Tyranny, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equal. This form of Common-weal had continuance, with some small changes according to the diversity of times, till the Reign of Philip and Alexander, Kings of Macedon: Who tempest-like overturned all things in that part of the World. For those twelve Cities, called the Cities of Alliance (whereof, Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten up a little before the Battel of Leuctras) were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a War, no less foolish than cruel, among themselves. But in the one Hundred and four and twentieth Olympiad (in which, or near it, Ptolemy the Son of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy Ceraunus, left the World) two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Parentes and the Dimeis, united themselves, and laid the foundation of the general accord, and reunion, which after followed. For having been, some of them Parisians with sundry Macedonian Captains, and others having been governed by petty Kings; they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of amity, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first Voyage into Italy. Now after the uniting of the Parentes and Dimeis, to whom also the Cities of Tyrus, and Phara, joyned themselves; Agira chased out her Garrisons: And the Burians, killing their Kings, entered with the Ceraunians into the same confederacy. These Cities, for twenty and five years, used the same form of Government with the Achaïans; who by a Senatory and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Common-weal; and soon after by one Prætor, or Commander: Of which, Marcius Ceryneus was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who, living at Argos in exile, whilst his Country was oppressed by Tyrants, found means, through the help of other banished men, to enter their own City by night, with ladders; whence they chased the Tyrant, and restored the people to liberty. This was in the time of Antigonus the King of Macedon, a Prince more bulle in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wife in looking to his own. For fear of Antigonus, the Sicyonians enter into the Achaïan league: Which though at that time it received more increase by their accession than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction proved well enough against Antigonus, whose subtility was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industry and counsel of Aratus delivered the Country from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaïan league; so further, by his great liberality, with the exceeding great cost of 150. Talents, he pacified the inexplicable controversies, between the banished Sicyonians; which returned with him, and the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same money he drew many others to assist him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaia. The money he obtained of Ptolemy Euergetes King of Egypt; who partly had a desire to hold some strong and sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conversation of Aratus himself, that made a dangerous Voyage to him into Egypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious pieces, wherein the workmen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadel of Corinth; which he won by night, being therein guided by some Thieves that he had hired for the purpose; who living in the place, had practised to rob Antigonus his treasury, passing in and out by a secret path among the Rocks. Yet he was fain to fight for it, ere he could get it: Though indeed Antigonus his Soldiers were rather overcome by their own fear, than by any force of the assailants; as mistrusting least the Achaïans were more in number, than in truth they were, and having lost the advantages of the place already, upon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemy.

In this kind of night-services, ambushments; surprizes, and practices, Aratus was very cunning, adventurous, and valiant: In open Field, and plain Battail, he was as valorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he mingled argument of diffipation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approved) might look pale and tremble, when he began to Battail; and whether the virtue of Fortitude were diversified, by the sundry natures of men, and in a manner confined unto several sorts of action. In resolving which doubts it may be said, that all virtue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: Though a natural inclination standeth in need of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, use, good success, and other help, yet hardly shall grow absolute in general. Such was Aratus in matter of War. In sincere affection to his Country he was unrepentable, and so acknowledged: As his following actions will truly testify.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and joyned unto the Common-weal of Achaia, the Megarians revolted soon after from Antigonus, and entered into the

the same Corporation. So did the Traceniens, and the Epidaurians: Whereby this new erected State grew to powerful, that it adventured to take Athen, from the Macedonians, and Argos and Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterprise upon the Athenians was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Isle of Salamis, to shew his strength, and sent home the Athenian Prisoners, without ranfome, to allure the City by shew of love; yet the Athenians fired neither against him, nor for him, as being now grown honest Slaves to Macedonians. Upon Argos the adventure was carried more strongly. The Achaïans came sometimes to the Gates of the City, but the People fired not; once they entered it, and might have won it, if the Citizens would have lent any help to the recovery of their own freedom, sundry times, and with divers events, they fought with the Tyrants, (who rose up one after another in Argos) in open field, and flew one of them in Battail; but all sufficed not: Until at length Aristomachus the Tyrant was terrified, persuaded, and hired by Aratus, that he consented to resign his Estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus, that had oppressed the Phliasiens.

Whilst this business with the Argives was on foot, Lysidas the Tyrant of Megalopolis, was so well handled by Aratus, that, without tumult, he gave liberty to his City, and annexed it to the Council of Achaia: Whereby he got such credit, that he was chosen General of their Forces (which was a Yearly Office, and might not be held two Years together by one man: y every Second Year, for a certain while, he and Aratus succeeded one another by turns. But those late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lysidas and Aristomachus, were carried with private passion from care of the general good; in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appear in due time.
